its charter would be abrogated, unless cause should be shown to warrant it, of which I was uninformed, and could express no opinion. On the contrary, when the commercial embarrassments and distress commenced here, and great alarm began to be entertained by the community in relation to the credit and institutions of our country, my opinion was frequently asked as to the solvency and ability of our moneyed institutions, and especially those of Philadelphia and New York, and was freely given, under the hope of dissipating the fears that were entertained, and restoring confidence. All this of course became known to the friend (John Duer, Esq. of New York) to whom my letter was addressed. This gentleman was here as the agent of a large local moneyed institution in the city of New York, and felt not only deeply interested, but alarmed, at the state of embarrassment and distress which had taken place, and was likely to increase. Knowing what had taken place, and the desire that I had manifested to prevent, as far as I could, that state of things which the editor of the Commercial had charged me with endeavoring to produce, he addressed to me the friendly letter to which mine was an answer. It was in this way that the correspondence took place. It is proper, however, that I should correct a misapprehension into which he has fallen as to the declaration made by Mr. Bates to myself and to which allusion is made by him in the extract, of his letter to his friend in New York. Mr. Bates did not speak of Mr. Rush. When casually speaking of the attack, which he had either seen or heard of in the Commercial, he remarked that it was unjust to charge me with an attempt to injure the credit and institutions of our country, when my opinion had been relied on as counteracting that of others. The conversation was an incidental one, and rose entirely from the attack in the Commercial Advertiser, which had just been received. This is a brief statement of this whole matter. I submit it to the liberal and just portion of my countrymen, with a confidence that they will see it in its proper light, and appreciate the motives under which I have acted.

PICTURE GALLERY OF "THE PARTY."

We yesterday gave a portrait of Mr. Van Buren drawn from life, by John C. Calhoun. The Richmond Whig furnishes the following line sketch of two of the faithful in Virginia:

From the Richmond Whig.

"I think in an article in the Whig of this morning you do Mr. Wm. C. Rives, Judge T———, J. M. Mason and some others of the great democratic party injustice' in giving Judge Philip Pendleton Barbour pre eminence in the list of apostates.—That is a distinction to which he is scarcely justly entitled—at least, I think the worthies whom I have mentioned have a right to rank with him. &c."

So says the note of a friend—but we have notions a little different from his. There are grades in apostacy, as well as in homicide. The individual, who coolly and deliberately, with malice prepense, afore-thought, to gratify passion or amass money, puts to death a fellow being, is justly held guilty of one of the highest crimes known to human laws. But if the same individual, upon a sudden affray, in the heat of blood or passion, without malice, should bring destruction on others, he is held to have committed an offence of mitigated enormity. The same principles apply to apostates. The man who coolly sits down in his closet and deliberately calculates how he may make most by apostatising from his principles and making a cold blooded bargain and sale of his conscience, occupies the same position in the code political, that the murderer does in the code legal. And such appears to us to have been the course of the Hon. P. P. B. He was, as is known to every body, the most ranting and raving of all our State Right School,—the Federal Government was a monster which he could not contemplate without a chattering of teeth and general shaking of bones. But a small anuity for life, with a promise of more, dissipated all his fears, repressed his patriotic fervor and silenced his oily tongue against federal supremacy. And when the additional bounty (or just before it) was bestowed and he was elevated to the Supreme Bench, he was required by the contract to give not a mere silent approbation, but an open commendation to the men and measures he detested, or rather had always professed to detest.

The case is not so bad with those mentioned in the note above; or at least with Mr. Rives. There are some extenuating circumstances, which reduce his offence from murder to manslaughter. He has not been ensconced in his closet quietly devising schemes of treachery; he, on the contrary, has been in the heat of battle; his reason blinded by passion, and his little heart swollen to its utmost tension with rage and fury. These considerations induce us to regard with mitigated abhorrence his manifold aberrations from the path of rectitude.

SUFFERING FROM THIRST.—Campbell, the poet, in his letters from Africa, relates the following circumstance as one of the horrible scenes to which the French army in that country are exposed. "Some twelve miles from the Oran, we passed the spot where, a year and a half ago, there had been hard fighting between the French and the natives. The French soldiers, though an overmatch for the Arabs, suffered dreadfully from heat and thirst. Their store of water was exhausted; the breath of the simoon set in; the cavalry stood its shock and by their elevation from the ground were able to respire, but the foot soldiers fell by companies, gasping for breath. A captain of dragoons, who was in the scene, told me there was more than one instance of the infantry soldier, driven to madness by thirst and agony, putting his head to the mouth of his musket, and his foot to the trigger, and committing suicide. One infantry officer alone gave way to despair; and though it is probable that he was, in these circumstances, no more a responsible agent than a man in the delirium of a fever, yet it was better, perhaps, that he did not survive the occurrence. He pulled his purse from his pocket; he said to his men:—"I have always been a kind officer to you; the horror of my sufferings is now insupportable; let the man among you who is my best friend, shoot me dead, and here are thirty louis d'ors for his legacy. No man would comply with his request; but he had hardly uttered it when he fell down and expired.

JACKSON, (Miss.) May 18, 1837.

Messers Gales & Seaton: The Legislature of this state [Mississippi] has just adjourned. They have done nothing towards relieving the distress of the State. In fact, nothing can be done by a State Government. Relief must come from the Federal Government or not at all. No other kind of legislation can be of any benefit to the country.

"It is deplorable to see a State, possessing the wealth that this State does, prostrated at a blow. A few months ago every thing was life and animation among us. Now, things look gloomy and heart-sickening."

A LARGE TURTLE.

Caroline County, June 1837

A Turtle was caught out of the Mill Pond at Hunting Creek, in this county, by Wm. Willoughby, that weighed 43 lbs. and the date on his shell 1701 very perceptible; both the weight and date were witnessed by several gentleman and ladies who will vouch for the facts. It is certainly a curiosity and if you should think so, you can give it place in your paper. I had forgotten to add that the Turtle moved off with a man on his back, apparently with great ease.

WOMEN AND MEN.—"A woman's head is generally over ears in her heart. Man seems to have been designed for the more superior being of the two. but as things are, I think women are generally better creatures than men, they have, taken universally, weaker appetites and weaker intellects, but they have much stronger affections. A man with a bad heart has sometimes been saved by a strong head, but a corrupt woman is lost for ever."—Coleridge.

And whereas, the President of the United States has, by Proclamation, called a special or extra session of Congress, to commence on the first Monday of September next, which, in the opinion of the Governor and Council, makes it necessary that the Representatives in Congress from this State, should be chosen before the time fixed by law for such election.
