THE INAUGURAL ADDRESS.

As our space will not permit the publication of President Cleveland's inaugural entire we give the following very full compilation of its contents from the Baltimore Sun of Thursday :

The address of President Cleveland yesterday in assuming the functions of chief executive of the government of the United States was worthy of the occasion and in keeping with the speaker's past career, being expressive throughout of a lofty conception of official duty, and indicating a wise comprehension of the nature of our government, its proper aims and ends, and of the fundamental truths upon the observance of which the welfare of the people depends. It sounds in every line the keynote of just, prudent and conservative administration, within constitutional limits and in accordance with the best traditions of the republic. It indicates that while there must be changes of policy and renew era is to be one of strict observance of law and of respect for vested rights. In the outset of his address the President declares that it is with a "solemn sense of responsibility" that he owes to "all the people of the land," and that in the high office to which they have called him scientious concern for the general weal." Sectional prejudices and distrust should be abandoned in favor of a united effort to "realize all benefits which our happy form of government can bestow." Passing from the special aspects of the present situation to the general principles that will guide his administration of affairs, President Cleveland announced that in the discharge of his official duty he would be guided by "a just and unrestrained construction of the constitution," at the same time carefully observthe right to protection from incompetency of insure success.
