CHAPTER X TITHEN Jackie caught sight of Knox and the reporter following him out of police headquarters he gave way to blind panic as he realized that they had discovered his secret. Leaping into his car, which had been parked in front of the building, he tore down the crowded street at breakneck speed, ignoring traffic lights and causing pedestrians to scatter in all directions. "Look at the foot go!" cried the lieutenant as he made a dash for a patrol car nearly "Come on. Steve We've got to stop him, before he kills somebody else."

"He's driving like a maniac." Steve shouted once above the roar of the motor "Our only chance is to corner him or head him off."

Knox nodded grimly and pushed the accelerator to the floorboard. The reporter took a deep breath, shut his eyes and settled back into his scat as if expecting the worst to happen.

And it did. Jackie gave way to his old failing of cutting a curve too close. As a truck loomed around the bend he twisted the wheel madly. The great car, traveling ninety miles an hour, swerved far out to the left side of the road. failed to recover and crashed headlong into a telephone pole . . .

DOGS

This afternoon (August 25 at Winston Salem) I saw a group of High School dogs perform at the Downie Brothers Circus which brought back memories of twenty-five years ago when Gentry Brothers Dog and Pony Show was the joy of every child and the imitations put on under a burlap bag tent by the neighborhood boys. Dogs painted yellow became lions while most any hound pup made a fair looking "Whatsis" when his ears and tail had been cropped off. A merry-go-round plank with a dog tied to one end and a cat to the other made perpetual motion. Stripes might have made the wild cat wild but shoe polish stripes made a "yaller dog" look like a bengal tiger. Two octogan soap wrappers was the price of admission. Five shows was equal to one Barlow pocket knife or a first baseman's

"Dog is man's best friend," is an anxiom as well known as "Kick my dog. kick me." And it is well to mention that there is a decided difference of opinion on the humor or sympathy found in the high speed and noise resulting from a poor dog's effort to get away from a bouncing tin can tied to the end of his tail. Boys must be thinking better of dogs these days-at least I haven't heard of a "tin-canned" dog in years. "Leading a dog's life in 1936" is to say "Living the life of Riley."
