EVENTS LEADING UP TO THE TRIAL OF MURDERERS

stained with blood, although most of this had been washed away by the elements. When brought back to the jail and confronted with the weapon, Paroway identified it and again broke down. He declared he had found it back of the store and had carried it to the scene of the crime. He repeatedly asked for protection and declared he was sorry for his deed. He went into the most minute details of his crime and by letting him talk, the inquisitors obtained all the information for which they had been searching.

Jervis Hynson is charged with being an accessory to the crime, but stoutly denies complicity, and neither Mabel nor Paroway in their confession asserts that he accompained them on the night of the murder and robbery. Several years ago Hynson, while gunning, shot and killed a young boy. He was arrested, but intentional shooting could not be shown. His arrest with the other negroes was due principally to the reputation he bears in the vicinity.

Mabel also had been in trouble hereon several occasions. He is said to have threatened to hang up Paroway four years ago and, it is said, was only prevented from doing so by friends of the latter, who rescued him from the enraged negro.

Paroway is only 16 years old and small in statue, while Mabel, though of the same age, is of rather powerful build.

While the residents of this place were somewhat pacified by the announcement of State Attorney Vickers that both Mabel and Paroway will be brought to a speedy trial, following their indictment by the grand jury, many citizens feel that the negroes should be lynched as an example to other blacks of criminal tendency.

Sent There Once Before

Once before, though nearly 20 years ago, the Baltimore police were sent to Chestertown to prevent a lynching. The first time was when eight negroes, who were charged with the murder of Dr. Hill, a popular physician of Kent county, were tried and convicted. Governor Frank Brown was Maryland's chief executive at that time, and because of mitigating circumstances he commuted the death sentence of four of the murderers to imprisonment for life.

But the Governor was fearful of the threats of the Kent county farmers should his decision to commute be known to them in advance. A squad of detectives, carrying the executive commutation of sentence, [illegible] placed quietly aboard one of the [illegible] boats, for it was [illegible] and Chester [illegible] no ordinary [illegible] through the [illegible] town in [illegible] morning [illegible] were deserted. Even [illegible] Sheriff, in charge of the jail, knew [illegible] thing of the Governor's coup. Before the squad of detectives reached the town jail they were seen by a suspicious citizen and the alarm was given. But in a few minutes the Governor's order was delivered to the Sheriff, the four prisoners were hastily taken from their cells and, trembling with fear, were hurried aboard the iceboat and were safely landed in Baltimore the next forenoon.

The majority of Chestertown's citizens did not know of the coup until after it had been consummated. Four negroes were hanged for the murder in the Chestertown jailyard Jan. 13th, 1893. The four whose sentences were commuted died in the Maryland Penitentiary.

THE FOURTH DECADE OF A WANDERING BOY

[Written especially for the KENT NEWS.]

I remember the capture of the dredges by the Sheriff and Capt. Wm. Parker, under the old law, and from what I have seen in after years, I believe it was the best oyster law we people ever had, under the old law the counties could protect their own oyster grounds, where we are led to believe the violators and dredgers are not the best people that ever lived, as I remember sometime in March their was a great excitement in the town, Capt. Wm. Parker summoned the posse to take the next steamer that came to the wharf to go down to Swan Point to arrest the violators, about one o'clock up came Hugh Jenkins, captained by a man named Tilman, Capt. Parker walked aboard with his posse, made his demand to the Captain, after some grumbling they started on down the river about night they came back, and as I remember with thirteen boats some of them partly loaded with oysters, he put them above the bridge in a few days they unloaded what oysters they had on the wharf and sold them at 25c a bushel.

The law as I remember then the boats and cargo was confiscated to pay the expenses. It was a great time for our town people as oysters were very cheap then, and it pleased them that attended court. I think the court was then held in March, it was more largely attended in those days.

I will give you what I remember about Wm. Parker, I know one thing about him he was a terror to evil doers. He came here as I learn from Back River Neck in Baltimore County. He married a Miss Stansbury, he moved from there to Rock Hall. He was very active in our county, being deputy Sheriff on several occasions and was very active in every hard undertaking to find out violaters of the law. About fifteen years ago I received a letter from some of his wife's relatives and to give a general history so far as I know of him, the reason they wrote to me was I had a near relative that married in the Stanbury family. They were a very prominent people as one of their relatives had been mayor of Baltimore.

Court was coming on and I was a juror with Capt. Columbus Leary; we were on the jury together; we were good friends and knowing he could give me the reliable events that happened in Kent county, I got him to help me trace Parkers case up. We went into it and found out when he died and where was buried, and if I remember, Capt. Leary said he helped to bury him, pointing out the place to me which was right outside of the back courthouse door. I reported to the Stanbury people and I have heard they have taken no action in regards to his remains. I knew Parker well, he was a brave fearless man.

The ministers that were at the various churches in town as I remember at the church near the depot was the Rev. Mr. Valliant and the Rev Mr. Dunn, on the square was the Rev. Thomas Sumption and the Rev. Wm. Pettit. They had charge of what was called Kent Circuit, which compris d of Chestertown, Rock Hall, Hynsons Chapel, and Still Pond. Hynson Chapel was the old church as you go to Hale's corner. The church on the corner of the Courthouse green was the late Rev. Clement F. Jones, who afterwards bought the Isaac Bull farm near Lynch's and went there to live. I remember very well I moved on a farm near Still Pond and he came up to see me.

FINE PUT ON BETTERTON MEN.

A hundred-dollar fine was imposed on a citizen of Betterton by Justice Supplee at the central Police Station, Baltimore, for unintentional violation of the ducking law last Saturday. L. Wethered Barroll, Esq., represented the defendant and paid the fine. The defendant did not appear in the proceedings.

Two years ago the Legislature at the instance of persons around Betterton passed a bill permitting the killing of ducks from power boats in the upper part of the bay, but not within a mile of the Western shore. The excuse given for changing the law which made power boat shooting illegal was that many ducks, wounded by gunners on the Havre de Grace flats, flew over to Betterton, and the Betterton gunners desired to kill them. The new laws has opened up a lot of power boat shooting and to this the people interested in game protection strenuously objected.

JOHNS HOPKINS GLEE CLUB

The Glee and Instrumental Clubs of the Johns Hopkins University gave a concert and dance Monday evening, December 29th, at the Firemen's Hall, Chestertown, Md. The clubs left Baltimore on an early train and arrived at Chestertown shortly before dinner.

At 5 o'clock the members of the clubs were invited to attend a tea at the home of Mrs. J. D. Bacchus, where they met a number of the young people of Chestertown. The concert was given in the hall of the Firemen's Building and consisted of about 16 numbers, including vocal and instrumental choruses and solos, selections by an octette and an original number by "The Whistling Quartette." Several of the Hopkins school songs and yells were also given. An attentive and fashionable audience of about 150 showed repeated appreciation of the renditions, and called for several encores. After the concert the clubs gave a dance, which every one seemed to enjoy, both participants and spectators. The pretty gowns were rivalled only by the pretty girls, and when the wee small hours of the morning came every one seemed loathe to stop dancing.

After a few and insufficient hours of sleep, the clubs took the train for Salisbury, Md., where they were scheduled for a concert on Tuesday night. They will return to Baltimore Wednesday.
