TO COMBAT HORSE DISEASE

(BY COUNTY AGENT McVEAN)

Experience with the outbreak of Encephalomyelitis of horses and mules which occurred during the late summer and fall of last year through the counties of Southern Maryland and the Southern part of the Eastern Shore, seemed to point to mosquitoes and possibly other insects as an agency in the spread of the disease. General protective measures against this disease this year should include the use of fly sprays and other means of keeping insects away, and keeping the animals out of low-lying pastures and in darkened stables during the time that mosquitoes and other insects are most active. The disease manifests itself in the form of sudden dullness, stumbling gait, loss of appetite, resting against the side of the stall, barn or fence and very rapid general decline and death. All animals should be closely watched for any change from normal behavior. At the first sign the local veterinarian should be called, since a serum has been put on the market this year which is made for use in this disease. Tetanus Antitoxin and such other products made for use in other diseases have no value in Encephalomyelitis. The disease should also be reported to the Live Stock Sanitary Service, or to one of its agents or to the County Agricultural Agent.
