FOUR YEAR FEAR A HABIT

There is no logical reason why the election of a president, a lower house of congress and perhaps one-third of the upper house should have any disturbing effect on the business of the nation. The United States has got along very well under the constitution for some hundred and forty years. In our earlier days conditions were chaotic, there was no such thing as credit for America; the value of American Currency was lower than any currency in the world. But with the adoption of the Constitution there began a reign of orderliness and growing stability that has never ceased.

Political croakers from time to time have sought to frighten the people by forebodings of what was to happen to the nation if this, that, or the other candidate were elected or if this, that, or the other policy became the policy of the nation. The plain fact is that no matter what has happened, Amercia has continued its onward march; the people have grown more prosperous; the happiness of the people has been greater; their vision wider; their charity more all embracing and their patriotism more deeply rooted.

Politics is a necessary factor in our lives. There must be government, there must be parties, elections and rivals. Out of this maelstrom of thought comes our advancement. Let us hope the American people will have enough balance to realize that they should pay attention only to the constructive elements in our political struggles and discard consideration of everything that deals with portending trouble; everyone, Republican, Democrat, and Independent alike realizing hat no matter what may be the result of the issue, America will progress, and times be better.

WHEAT, CORN AND PANTALETTES

Wages in the clothing industry are today two hundred to two hundred and fifty per cent higher than they were prior to the war. The sweeping advance is called to attention as typifying conditions regarding labor costs generally, so that we may realize how unlikely is any readjustment to a point where it will affect the the cost of living. The manufacturer has been compelled to cut prices to some extent, but the reductions do not seem to have affected he retailer in a marked way.

Often it is said the capacity of American manufacturing industries has developed beyond our power of absorption and that we must have exports to take care of our surplus. The fact s that we can consume everything labor can produce in this country and much more if products are manufactured in correct proportions and are valued of each other in right relations.

The problem is one of properly adjusting exchanges. Our chief difficulty is the high level of manufactured goods as against prices for the products on the farms. This is the problem to which economists and politicians need most to address themselves. Once solved we need have no need to worry over our lack of export markets. The answer is not a lowering the wage, but a readjustment of values with a realization that wheat and corn are of more moment than pink or blue silk pantalettes.
