Making Good.

There is no way of making lasting friends like "Making Good;" and Doctor Pierce's medicines well exemplify this, and their friends, after more than two decades of popularity, are numbered by the hundreds of thousands. They have "made good" and they have not made drunkards.

A good, honest, square-deal medicine of known composition is Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. It still enjoys an immense sale, while most of the preparations that have come into prominence in the earlier period of its popularity have "gone by the board" and are never more heard of. There must be some reason for this long-time popularity and that is to be found in its superior merits. When once given a fair trial for weak stomach, or for liver and blood affections, its superior curative qualities are soon manifest; hence it has survived and grown in popular favor, while scores of less meritorious articles have suddenly flashed into favor for a brief period and then been as soon forgotten.

For a torpid liver with its attendant indigestion, dyspepsia, headache, perhaps dizziness, foul breath, nasty coated tongue, with bitter taste, loss of appetite, with distress after eating, nervousness and debility, nothing is so good as Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. It's an honest, square-deal medicine with all its ingredients printed on bottle-wrapper—no secret, no hocus-pocus humbug, therefore don't accept a substitute that the dealer may possibly make a little bigger profit. Insist on your right to have what you call for.

Don't buy Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription expecting it to prove a "cure-all." It is only advised for woman's special ailments. It makes weak women strong and sick women well. Less advertised than some preparations sold for like purposes, its sterling curative virtues still maintain its position in the front ranks, where it stood over two decades ago. As an invigorating tonic and strengthening nervine it is unequaled. It won't satisfy those who want "booze," for there is not a drop of alcohol in it.

Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets, the original Little Liver Pills, although the first pill of their kind in the market, still lead, and when once tried are ever afterwards in favor. Easy to take as candy—one to three a dose. Much imitated but never equaled.

HIS COURSE IN LOVE.

By LULU JOHNSON

Copyright, 1907, by M. M. Cunningham.

On the whole, Treadway thought it rather nice of him to be willing to marry Marion Hitesman. He was possessed of an income of half a million a year, the income from his mother's estate, and when his father died—well, it required the services of two men to keep track of the Treadway investments.

Marion was a dainty little country woman, but she would need a lot of social training, of course. Perhaps a year in a finishing school might be a good thing to fit her for the place in society she was destined to fill. It might be a bother to wait a year before marriage, though, so on second thoughts perhaps a social secretary would be a better plan. Treadway decided upon the social secretary as the lesser of two necessary evils.

Marion Hitesman was only a little country girl, the belle of Wichfield, a village of a few thousand persons. Treadway had been forced to stop over there for repairs to his automobile, and before these were made he had seen Marion. After that the automobile was called upon only for little trips to nearby points of interest, and Treadway paid his easy going court to the girl.

Perkins, his father's lawyer, made his summer home in Wichfield, and the introduction was easily accomplished, but Treadway found courtship according to Wichfield notions rather complicated. In town he would have left a standing order with the florist and confectioner. There would have been an occasional motor excursion and finally a proposal of marriage in the conservatory at some one's dance and a note in the society columns of the papers.

Here it was all different, and, while he enjoyed the novelty of it, he found it rather awkward at times. In town mammas with marriageable daughters were willing to do more than half the courtship for him. Here he found himself on the same level of equality in the Hitesman home as Ben Taylor, who clerked in Luscomb's grocery.

TREADWAY WATCHED HER WISTFULLY.

Even this fact did not serve to warn him, however, and his declaration was entirely characteristic. The two were returning from a ride in the country. A score of couples had gone out to the home of a farmer host, and the road was dotted with buggies. At Marion's command Treadway had not thrown on speed to outstrip the others, as he usually did, and the car rolled along as quietly as though it were under the observation of a string of traffic police.

Marion, leaning back against the upholstered cushions, gave a luxurious little sigh.

"I love automobiling," she said, "when the car does not run too fast."

"You shall have an automobile for your own," he promised, "when we are married."

"Are we to be married?" she asked, with a touch of coldness in her voice.

"I hope so," was the prompt reply. "I've got a lot of money, and in time I shall have a lot more. I can give you everything you want and introduce you into society. Of course you'll have to coach up a little, but you'll make it all right. Is it a go?"

"No, thank you," said Marion very quietly. "I admit that the proposition you make is glittering in the extreme, but I must decline."

"Decline!" he gasped in amazement. "Why, I know a hundred girls in New York who would just jump at the chance!"

"In that case," was the quiet retort, "I shall omit the customary expressions of regret. No doubt you will find quick consolation."

Treadway was too stunned to argue. He busied himself with the steering wheel until the big black car drew up in front of the Hitesman home. He helped her out and opened the gate for her.

"It is goodby as well as good night," he said as she held out her hand. "I shall be gone in the morning."

She stammered something he could not catch and hurried up the walk to the house. Treadway watched her wistfully until the door closed behind her; then he went away, carrying in his heart the memory of a slender figure silhouetted against the light from the open door.

In the early dawn the big touring car slipped down the dusty road. There was the usual gossip, and then Wichfield forgot Treadway in the excitement of a revival meeting at which a famous evangelist exhorted. But Treadway did not forget, even though he put the width of the Atlantic between himself and the little town where he had met defeat. He dawdled in London and loafed miserably in Paris, but he could not forget the girl with the big brown eyes, and he was glad when at last he turned his steps homeward.

The summer had passed, but the brisk autumnal air made touring a delight, and presently for a second time the big black car rolled into Wichfield. Perkins, the Treadway lawyer, had closed his house and gone back to town, but there was an excellent hotel, and presently Treadway found himself installed in a comfortable room. Once settled he sallied forth to find Marion.

She was not at home, they told him at the house, but Mrs. Hitesman added minute directions by which he found the patch of woods where Marion had gone in search of nuts.

Evidently her nutting was but an excuse for a walk in the woods, for he came upon her day dreaming at the foot of a huge chestnut. As he approached the looked up wonderingly; then, after a moment's pause, she sprang to her feet with outstretched hands.

"For a moment I thought you must be a vision," she cried as he hurried toward her. "Mr. Perkins told me just before he left that you had gone abroad for the winter."

"I did go across," he confirmed, "but I couldn't stay. I wanted to come back and ask you if your decision was final."

"My decision?" she echoed.

"Yes," he explained. "I know you told me that you would not marry me, but I could not be content until I asked again. I went to London and Paris to try to forget you, but the farther from home I got the more I seemed to want you, and so here I am."

"But the hundred or more who were ready to accept you and your millions?" she reminded.

"There might be a million or more who would be ready to accept my hundreds," he replied impatiently, "but the whole million in one big seraglio would not be you, dear. It was a silly, braggart speech that I am heartily ashamed of now. It was that which brought me back. I wanted to tell you how well I realized what a fool I had been. I love you too much to give up without another appeal. I've a whole lot to learn, Marion, but will you be the teacher, dear, and show me that the cursed money is not everything?"

"I think I should like to try," she whispered as he caught her hand.

"And I came over here prepared for the argument of my life," he said wonderingly.

"You said this time what you should have said before," she replied. "The last time you offered me wealth and position. This time you have offered me your love. It is love that a girl wants, Tom. It's not always the money she seeks. I liked you before, but I could not be bought."

"But I loved you then," he cried.

"Not in the same way," she explained, "for you would have told me so. You wanted me to teach you. That was the first lesson."

"Then here endeth the first lesson," cried Treadway, with a laugh, as he bent to touch the soft brown hair with his lips. "Let's hope the others will not be so drastic. You've been pretty hard on your pupil, sweetheart."

Tricking a Jeweler.

A fashionably dressed woman once alighted from a brougham in west London and stepped into a hairdresser's shop. She informed the barber that she had a son who was of unsound mind and that the doctor had ordered his head to be shaved.

Her son, she said, was violent, and she instructed the barber to get a couple of assistants and seize him when he was brought round, to tie him in a chair and shave his head in spite of anything he might say. The barber did not relish the job, but an advance fee of a guinea tempted him, and he fell.

Then the lady drove to the jeweler's, bought some expensive rings and jewelry and expressed surprise at having left her purse at home. She offered to drive the jeweler home with her, together with the jewels, and pay him at her residence.

On arriving once more at the barber's the two alighted, and the unfortunate jeweler at a sign from the lady was seized and bound to a chair, and in spite of his angry yells and expostulations his head was shaved. Meanwhile the lady drove off with £300 worth of gems and was never heard of again.—London Mail.

Not Necessary.

He laughed loud and long as he put aside the paper.

"What's the matter?" asked the man who was sitting at the next window of the club.

"Here's an article about training a dog," replied the man who had been reading the paper. "It says the first thing to do is to attach the dog to you."

Thereupon the man laughed some more.

"Well, what of it?" persisted the man at the next window.

"Why, hang it all," exclaimed the man who was so amused, "it seems so absurd, you know. My experience is that a dog will attach himself to you if you give him any provocation."—Exchange.

DRIED FRUITS AS CONCENTRATED FOOD.

Analysis Shows That in Proportion to Cost They Are the Most Nourishing of All Natural Products.

Professor Otto Hehner, who may be called the "Dr. Wiley of England," has made a special study of the food value of dried fruits, including dates, figs, currants, sultanas and raisins. In the tables Professor Hehner has prepared of his analyses currants show the largest proportion of sugar and the largest proportion of soluble material.

After mentioning that all the samples of currants examined, from the best to the cheapest qualities, showed practically the same food values Professor Hehner says:

"While it is clear that by far the chief value of currants as an article of food depends upon their contents in saccharine material, in regard to which they are equaled, as far as I know, yet not surpassed, by a single natural food product—namely, honey—their contents in organic acid, mainly consisting of tartaric acid, is of considerable importance.

"The acidity amounts to about 1½ per cent. It covers, modifies and to some extent hides the enormous proportion of sugar. A material consisting of a sugar sirup containing 70 per cent of sugar and 20 per cent of water, such as does honey, is so intensely sweet that it can be consumed only in comparatively small quantities at a time.

"The taste of currants, modified as it is by the large proportion of organic acid, is so far removed from that of honey, with its equal percentage of sugar, that it requires the chemical evidence given in the analyses to convince the consumer of its high sugar value. Furthermore, there can be no doubt that dietetic value must be ascribed to the potash, which in the form of cream of tartar always accompanies the tartaric acid of the grape.

"It is quite clear that dried grapes, particularly in the form of currants, occupy a very high place in the list of concentrated foods and that they deserve a much higher place in the human dietary, and especially in that of the middle classes and poor, than they have hitherto occupied."

ALLOTS STOCK ON BASIS OF STATE POPULATION.

Telepost Takes Step to Secure Wide Distribution—Some States Already Have Their Share of First Series. No Water In New Wire Company.

To secure the widest possible distribution of its stock the new telegraph company, the Telepost, has announced an allotment of its shares on the basis of state population. The apportionment now made public gives the figures for each state, running from 372 shares for Wyoming to 29,076 shares for New York.

It was discovered in making up the schedules that a good many states had already subscribed for the full quota of stock to which they are entitled in the first series issued, but in no case will the allotment to any state be exceeded. Individual subscriptions are limited to 100 shares.

Of the company's total authorized capital of $18,000,000 the first 400,000 shares have been divided into four series for the purpose of putting into effect its plan for giving an advantage to pioneer investors without resorting to any form of stock watering. The first $7,000,000 of surplus earned by the company above 10 per cent dividends will be distributed to the subscribers of the first 400,000 shares in the form of construction debentures drawing 4 per cent and payable in twenty years.

These debentures will not be issued until the sum they represent has actually been spent for new construction and equipment. The basis of distribution is that of three-sevenths of the surplus to series A subscribers, two-sevenths to series B subscribers and one-seventh each to subscribers for C and D stock.

Rapid progress is being made by the Telepost in the establishment of its lines between several of the larger cities, where the coming of a company that promises a flat rate of twenty-five words for 25 cents without regard to distance is being encouraged in every way by business interests.

Currant Bread.

Unsweetened currant bread is used very largely abroad, where domestic economy occupies more thought than here. Adding about three parts of currants to seven parts of dough doubles the nutritive value of the loaf, makes it more palatable and saves butter. This is the way the argument of the English and German housewife runs.

Here is an approved recipe for currant bread as it is generally made in England:

Two pounds flour, one-quarter ounce salt, four ounces lard, one-half compressed yeast cake, one-half pound currants, one gill milk, water. Sift flour and add the salt and rub in the lard; then add the currants. Add yeast. Add a gill of tepid water and make into a batter; then let it stand for thirty minutes. Add half a pint of tepid water and a gill of milk and knead for ten minutes. More milk or water may be added if found too stiff. Let the dough stand in a warm place covered with a cloth until risen; then make into small loaves of even size and let them stand for another hour. Bake the loaves in a moderate oven.

The first English yacht race took place in 1662, the contestants being boats owned by Charles II. and his brother.
