Saved His Nose

An Account of the Defense of an American Girl In Munich

By F. A. MITCHEL

Copyright by American Press Association, 1911.

One evening in Munich a party of Americans were sitting at a table in the Hofbrauhaus ostensibly for testing the famous beer of that city, but really to view the different persons about them. The party consisted of a Mr. and Mrs. Hathorne, their son George, aged twenty-two; their daughter Grace, aged twenty, and Sir Clive Oglesby, a young British baronet whom they had met on their travels. At a near table several young German officers were drinking and chatting in a very loud tone. At a third table, alone, was a young man, and, since he had no one to talk to, his nationality did not appear. He looked, however, like either an Englishman or an American.

But it was not long before this young man was awakened from his quiescence by a remark made by one of the German officers sitting near. It was evident from a flush on his face that he understood the language in which the military men were conversing and what they said displeased him. This is what he heard:

"GENTLEMEN, YOU HAVE MADE A MISTAKE!"

"Those people over there are English."

"I would like to pigstick one of them."

"The girl is very pretty. I would like to kiss her."

"You might do so and not be called to account. These English don't fight."

"Nor the Americans."

A slight flush overspread the features of the young man at the third table when one of the officers said he would like to kiss Miss Hathorne.

Between the sexes, especially young people, there are sign expressions that stand in the place of words. Grace Hathorne's eye happened to light on the man sitting alone at the moment he flushed. It darted from him to the officers, and the two items gave her a clew. They were talking about her and had excited the indignation of the young civilian. Her father, her brother and the Britisher all sat, unmindful of what was going on, till Grace, feeling uncomfortable, said she was tired and wished to go to the hotel. The party arose, and as they did so one of the officers, who was half drunk, threw her a kiss with the words, "Goodby, beautiful daughter of Albion."

The situation was painfully embarrassing. Every man in the Hathorne party knew that resenting the insult would bring a challenge from the German. Sir Clive Oglesby grew very red in the face; George Hathorne started toward the Germans, but his mother caught the skirt of his coat and held him back. Mr. Hathorne drew his daughter's hand under his arm and marched her out of the Hofbrauhaus. The others of the party followed, showing great irritation.

When they had gone the young man at the third table drew a leather case from his pocket, took out a card, returned the case, arose and, passing over the few steps between him and the officers, laid it down before the one who had perpetrated the insult. It read, "Ward Claybourne, Kentucky, U. S. A."

"Gentlemen," he said, "you have made a mistake in these people whom you have insulted. Only one is English; the others are countrymen of mine. You are right in assuming that they do not fight. They are brought up in a different school. Fortunately for them, however, my education in your line has not been neglected. I will trouble you for a written apology, which I will be happy to transmit to the lady you have insulted."

The man who had received the card motioned to one of his comrades, who asked Mr. Claybourne's address and promised to bring a reply immediately. Having given it, the Kentuckian withdrew. His challenge, for that is what it amounted to, somewhat sobered the officers, especially the one who had received it. He was a good swordsman, but he knew nothing about the American. He had read in some book that Kentuckians were very expert with a weapon called the bowie knife, but was not aware that that period had long passed. He knew also that an apology was due from him. But, being an army man, he dared not refuse a challenge. His second called on Claybourne and said that if an apology was due it was due to the young lady and not to him. He would therefore accept the challenge.

It so happened that the Hathornes and Claybourne were stopping at the same hotel. Miss Hathorne, Sir Clive and one or two Americans were sitting in the lounging room talking over the disagreeable incident of the evening when Miss Hathorne saw one of the officers she had seen at the Hofbrauhaus come into the hotel. In a few minutes she saw him go out accompanied as far as the door by the young man of the third table. There was a puzzled look on her face for a few moments; then she paled. Could it be that this man who had flushed when the officers were looking at her had taken up the matter in her defense?

After the officer's departure she saw Claybourne go into the writing room. Excusing herself to those with her, she went in there. He was sitting at a desk writing, the only person in the room. She stood looking at him through a very large and very beautiful pair of eyes. He rose and stood deferentially.

"Are you English?" she asked.

"American."

"Would you mind assuring me that the visit just paid you has nothing to do with me?"

Claybourne was stumped. He made no reply.

"Is there to be—a duel?" she went on.

"This is very unfortunate," was the only reply.

"I forbid you to fight on my account."

"It would be impossible for me to obey your order."

"I will go to these men and forbid them as well."

She looked so resolute that Claybourne was troubled. He feared to be placed in a false position.

"I see only one possible way out of it," he said. "I am writing a telegram to a friend in Berlin to come and be my second. I will tell him to say something to the man I have challenged that may influence him. He doesn't know that I am a student at Heidelberg, a member of a corps there and that I have vanquished every man who has been brought against me."

"Don't send your telegram. This news can be conveyed without your Berlin friend. My brother"—

"Would not do at all."

"My father"—

"Worse."

"Give me the address of this officer."

"Impossible!"

"Give it to me," she repeated imperiously. "I am the cause of this quarrel. What right have you to take up my case and ignore me?"

"None," replied Claybourne, hanging his head, and gave her the address.

Without paying any more attention to him she left the room.

Claybourne gave vent to an expression very common among English speaking people. He crammed his fists down into his trousers pockets and strode to and fro.

"What a fool I have been," he said to himself, "to receive that fellow here! The whole thing is spoiled. I shall not only be deprived of the pleasure of punishing him—I should like to cut off his nose—but they will think I gave it away to the girl to induce her to break it up. What the dickens am I to do? Nothing till I hear from her. This is a pretty mess!"

He remained right where he was for an hour, walking the floor like a caged tiger. Then he heard wheels draw up in front of the house, the bang of a carriage door, and in a few moments in came Miss Hathorne, flushed with the effort she had made.

"For heaven's sake!" he said. "What have you done?"

She handed him a paper addressed to him. It was a written apology for the insult that had been offered her.

"How did you get it?"

"Asked for it. They at first declined to address it to you, but I declined to accept it unless they did."

"You have made a mess of it," said Claybourne, in an irritated tone, for the moment losing his self control.

"It would have been a worse mess for your opponent if I had not interfered. Do you know what his second said to him after it was all over? I didn't tell him who you were till then. Well, he said: 'Ach! Donnerhoff, you're lucky! If you had met that fellow you would have gone about for the rest of your life without a nose. They say he always finishes his opponents by cutting off their noses.'"

"That's exactly what I intended to do," cried Claybourne passionately, "and you have spoiled it all."

The girl burst into a laugh.

Gradually the comical view of the situation dawned upon Claybourne, and his face took on an unwilling smile. Miss Hathorne thought it the loveliest smile she had ever seen on a man's face.

"You didn't go to them alone, did you?" he asked.

"Yes, I did. It's no time to be prudish when a man's—nose is at stake."

She laughed again. So did Claybourne.

"I would like very much to make your acquaintance," said the Kentuckian.

There was another laugh on the part of both of them.

"Well," she said, "since you've taken my interference so considerately I think I'll permit you to call."

He called the next morning, and his call lasted during their stay in Munich, during their journey with frequent stops to London and during a voyage to America. In short, the call has never ended. Mr. and Mrs. Claybourne live in the blue grass region of Kentucky, but the husband never flourishes a bowie knife and has no desire to cut off people's noses.

Relieves Backache Instantly

Sloan's Liniment is a great remedy for backache. It penetrates and relieves the pain instantly—no rubbing necessary—just lay it on lightly.

Here's Proof.

"I had my back hurt in the Boer War and in San Francisco two years ago I was hit by a street car in the same place. I tried all kinds of dope without success. Two weeks ago I saw your liniment in a drug store and got a bottle to try. The first application caused instant relief, and now except for a little stiffness, I am almost well."
