BAREFOOTED CHILDREN.

Absence of Shoes and Stockings Said to Improve Health.

The barefooted child is very much in evidence in Baltimore. The writer knows some robust youngsters who in the whole of their lives until they were 5 years of age, never wore foot-covering of any sort. Then they began to go to a kindergarden, and so in winter time they were obliged to have their feet protected. But even then on the first warm day they appeared again minus boots and stockings the little bare extremities contrasting strangely with their smart blouse costumes.

And they are very healthy boys and girls; not one of them has ever had a cold in his life.

A Baltimore mother took her year-old infant to Philadelphia last week. This baby has never had on shoe or sock in his life, either, and the sight of his bare pink toes excited comment not only from his relatives, but from strangers on the street cars.

'Look at that poor little child," the latter would say; "the idea of bringing it out without even a stocking on its footsies—its positively cruel."

But the youngster jabbered contendedly, and its rosy cheeks showed even the most indignant of the critics that it prospered and waxed strong under this treatment, and so they were finally reduced to silence.

Apparently, shoes are a necessary part of the child's attire in the City of Brotherly Love. They are not in Baltimore.

SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE FOR JUNE, 1902.

Scribner's Magazine for June shows, in a striking manner, both the progress of the times due to the latest advances in knowledge and a wealth of original literary material—notably the two great serials by the leading American writers, Richard Harding Davis and F. Hopkinson Smith. These two stories, which reach the highest mark in the achievement of each writer, are entirely different in scope and treatment. One is a story of adventure and the other is a romance of artist-life in New York.

"The New Agriculture," by W. S. Harwood, is what the author calls glimpses into "the pages of the book of magic." Few people realize that a thousand trained scientific men are at work, and a million dollars are expended annually by the Government to support the agricultural experiment station in the various States. Within the last decade the work of these men, the results of which are freely given to the public, has revolutionized many branches of agriculture and added millions of dollars to the value of farm products in the United states. This article for the first time sets forth in popular form these wonderful achievements. The illustrations show some of the experiments in progress. The article will be an eye-opener to those who believe that agriculture has stood still while other American industries have gone ahead.
