Finds Too Much Talk In Nation's Conservation

Darling Declares America's Wild Life Population On Downgrade

Conservation of wild life is a subject about which more has been said and less done than anything in the world except the weather, declares J. N. ("Ding") Darling, cartoonist and former chief of the United States Biological Survey, in the current Rotarian Magazine. With America's wild-life population on the downhill skids, he says, much must be done to conserve for coming generations resources intended to be the heritage of all.

"We may inflate currency, but it won't put back soils on our eroded farms nor bring back our forests," he asserts. "We may accumulate all the gold in the world in our Treasury, but it won't put gifts of Nature."

Americans have poured down the rathole much of that which Nature gave them, writes Conservationist Darling, for rivers once teeming with fish are sewers; millions of acres of the richest soil have become ugly eroding scars; and forests of priceless value have been hacked down and burned away.

"We have lots of conservationists, but little conservation, and our resources continue to disappear," he observes. "Eleven million Americans pay an annual license fee to fish or hunt, and there are 36,000 societies, clubs, leagues, in one cause, they have saved the ducks afternoon, October 6, at 2:30 p. m., at be equally effective in other fields.
