GREAT COAL DISCOVERY

Comprises Over 2,000 Acres—Will Give Work, It Is Estimated, To 6,000 Men For 200 Years—Immense Veins That Can Be Mined.

A dispatch to the Baltimore Sun from Wilkesbarre, Pa., April 11, says: Veins that indicate the greatest discovery of anthracite coal in Pennsylvania since the first general discovery was made have just been uncovered by the Lehigh and Wilkesbarre and the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Companies near this city.

Two bores, one of 5,000 and the other of 2,300 feet, have been completed. They passed through 22 veins, one of which is a continuation of the celebrated Mammoth vein of the Hazleton district. Eleven veins not previously marked on the geological maps of the State were among the 22 pierced, and these lie closely from 50 to 700 feet below the surface. The other veins are deeper.

The discovery was made at a point three miles below this city. The district comprises an area of more than 2,000 acres, reaching from the river to Sugar Notch and Warrior run. It is the highest point in the basin where a bore has ever been started, the next highest being at Askam, several miles away.

Of the upper veins in the first 700 feet of the boring the experts knew nothing, although they discovered indications some time ago that there was coal there. The borings have been conducted secretly.

The fact of chief interest directly in the region is that enough coal has been found to give work to 6,000 men for 200 years. The marketable value at the present price is more than $1,000,000,000. It is estimated that there would be, if all the veins were put together, about 150 feet of coal spreading the whole width of the basin in that part, making altogether about 300,000,000 tons. The estimate is that it now costs about $1.50 to produce a ton of coal and put it on the track ready to send to market, and at that rate the men who mine the tract will earn about $450,000,000.

This discovery sets at rest all the repeated assertions that the coal in the Wyoming Valley will be mined out in 50 years.
