FOLEY'S HONEY AND TAR
stops the cough and heals lungs

A Most Valuable Agent.

The glycerine employed in Dr. Pierce's medicines greatly enhances the medicinal properties which it extracts from native medicinal roots and holds in solution much better than alcohol would. It also possesses medicinal properties of its own, being a valuable demulcent, nutritive, antiseptic and antiferment. It adds greatly to the efficacy of the Black Cherrybark, Bloodroot, Golden Seal root, Stone root and Queen's root, contained in "Golden Medical Discovery" in subduing chronic, or lingering coughs, bronchial, throat and lung affections, for all of which these agents are recommended by standard medical authorities.

In all cases where there is a wasting away of flesh, loss of appetite, with weak stomach, as in the early stages of consumption, there can be no doubt that glycerine acts as a valuable nutritive and aids the Golden Seal root, Stone root, Queen's root and Black Cherrybark in promoting digestion and building up the flesh and strength, controlling the cough and bringing about a healthy condition of the whole system. Of course, it must not be expected to work miracles. It will not cure consumption except in its earlier stages. It will cure very severe, obstinate, hang-on, chronic coughs, bronchial and laryngeal troubles, and chronic sore throat with hoarseness. In acute coughs it is not so effective. It is in the lingering hang-on coughs, or those of long standing, even when accompanied by bleeding from lungs, that it has performed its most marvelous cures.

Prof. Finley Ellingwood, M. D., of Bennett Med. College, Chicago, says of glycerine:

"In dyspepsia it serves an excellent purpose. Holding a fixed quantity of the peroxide of hydrogen in solution, it is one of the best manufactured products of the present time in its action upon enfeebled, disordered stomachs, especially if there is ulceration or catarrhal gastritis (catarrhal inflammation of stomach), it is a most efficient preparation. Glycerine will relieve many cases of pyrosis (heartburn) and excessive gastric (stomach) acidity."

"Golden Medical Discovery" enriches and purifies the blood curing blotches, pimples, eruptions, scrofulous swellings and old sores, or ulcers.

Send to Dr. R. V. Pierce, of Buffalo, N. Y., for free booklet telling all about the native medicinal roots composing this wonderful medicine. There is no alcohol in it.

The Eternal Thing.

By R. B. SHELTEN.

Copyrighted, 1909, by Associated Literary Press.

The fishing was bad. Even the judge, who had whipped the pools along the Little Beaver for years, could not remember a day when the trout had ignored the tempting flies so persistently and annoyingly.

When they gathered on the bank of the stream for lunch—the judge, the bishop and the banker—the subject of fishing, after a few tart remarks by the judge and the banker which made the bishop elevate his eyebrows in mild reproof, was tactfully avoided.

So eager were they not to mention or even think of those miserable trout that they talked of everything, anything, and finally the conversation drifted into an uncharted channel.

"Romance," said the judge dictatorially, taking up a remark of the banker, "is dead. There is no room for it in this hustling age. It has gone the way of sentiment and old time courtesy and the gentlemen of the old school."

"Good riddance to it," said the banker lazily. "Let it go. It has given way to better things—good horse sense, for instance."

The bishop looked at the purling water. He was a gray haired man, with kindly eyes and the most winning smile. He was smiling now as he turned to the two men.

"You are both wrong," said he, with deep conviction. "Romance is eternal! You can't kill it with a club or with hustle. But, of course, you two would not admit it even if you saw it."

The judge bristled. The banker roused himself, and his pipe glowed like a blast furnace.

"Romance," grunted the judge, with carefully unpleasant emphasis. "You

"IRREGULAR, MOST IRREGULAR," SAID THE BISHOP.

old cloistered dreamer, you want to rub elbows more with the world."

"Dollars and cents, dollars and cents," chanted the banker. "That's what the world is really after."

The bishop smiled with patient toleration. "Dear, dear, I'm glad I haven't the perspective of you two!" he said. "What a queer world you see through your black goggles! Romance! Why, that's what makes the world go round."

The banker and the judge exchanged knowing winks. They looked at the bishop with unconcealed pity.

"Speed up a bit and catch up with the procession," the banker advised.

"Perhaps you're the ones that are behind it," the bishop suggested, with a chuckle. "That reminds me," he continued. "Just twenty-five years ago, on this very spot, when I was a young minister, I was fishing here alone. You know Robert Harding, of course, you two," he interrupted himself—"fine, cynical beggar like you; never saw any romance in life and is all dollars and bustle, isn't he?"

"Well, so he is," growled the judge. "What's Robert Harding got to do with romance?"

"Oh, nothing much now, I suppose," laughed the bishop, "only it happens that twenty-five years ago there was a big camp of city people a few miles from here, and Robert Harding and May Fenelon were there with their parents. Those parents most unromantically had arranged unpleasing matches for those two, and they jumped into a canoe one morning and paddled down here and got me to marry them."

"Wouldn't have thought it was in him," said the banker. "Hello! Who's this?"

Down the stream came a canoe driven by the powerful strokes of the man at the paddle. In the bow was an attractive—a decidedly attractive—girl, who also essayed to paddle, but whose strokes really counted for little except as "moral support," as the bishop suggested chucklingly.

As soon as the man in the approaching canoe saw the little group on the bank he stopped paddling, looked sharply at the bishop and swung the craft to the bank.

"Are you Bishop Hale?" he asked excitedly.

"I am," the prelate admitted.

The young man turned quickly to the girl, who was flushing so beautifully that the judge and the banker forgot "hustle" and "dollars."

"What luck!" said the young man. "We were on our way to your camp! Sir, will you marry us?"

"Well, well," said the bishop. "Who are you, and what are you, and where did you come from, my eager young candidate?"

The young man smiled. "We're from the camp at the forks, just above here. This is an elopement, sir. We are running away from cruel parents—at any rate, they're bothering each of us to marry some one else, you know."

"Irregular, most irregular," said the bishop. "I have never married an eloping couple in my life except— However," he went on quickly, as he noted the blank expression of dismay on the two faces, "that doesn't argue that I may not act. Explain, if you please, very briefly, the circumstances that have induced you to—er—to take this step."

"A man with money and lots of power in his father's business," replied the young man, "which explains the young lady's position. As for mine, a very wealthy young woman whom my obstinate father prefers merely because he has so determined."

"I see," said the bishop. "You didn't tell me your name."

"Robert Harding," said the man in the canoe.

The judge and the banker both uttered a shout. "Did you speak?" asked the bishop sweetly, turning to them. Then he turned to the girl. "Do you fully realize the import of this step?" asked he.

"Indeed I do," said she. "If you'll please"— She glanced apprehensively over her shoulder in the direction from which they had just come.

The bishop's face was determined.

"Land!" he commanded. As the canoe shot to the bank it was the bishop himself who helped the girl out.

"Stand here—so—beneath this fir," he instructed. "Ned, Will," he went on, turning to the judge and the banker, "you two take your places here on the right. I haven't a prayer book with me, but I think I can go through the service with no omissions. You have no ring? Ned, let me have that ring of yours. If it's too large," he told the girl, smiling, "you can wrap it with a bit of string."

Through the still forest sounded the deep tones of the bishop's splendid voice. And all through that service there was a look of triumph on the bishop's face, and that look was directed at the wondering judge and the equally astonished banker.

* * * * * * *

The bishop, the judge and the banker, in the order named, had each kissed the bride. The canoe, with the young man bending to the paddle and the girl in the bow, had departed downstream, bombarded by pine needles, which the judge and the banker threw prodigally in lieu of rice.

It was only when Pierre, the head guide, touched the judge on the shoulder and declared they must certainly be starting if they wished to get downstream that night that the three men filed silently toward their forgotten canoes.

"Well," laughed the bishop, "for a saintly, cloistered, out of touch with the world dreamer I seem to have made a pretty fair guess about this romance business. Who's behind the procession, Will? Just tell me that, if you please."

The banker grunted.

"Buck up, Baptiste," urged the judge to the guide in his canoe. "I suppose I must admit that romance got somewhat of a lease of life just now, but I don't care to encounter the irate parents that will be on its trail."

"Not a bad idea to keep in the dark for a bit," the bishop chuckled and added to the guide. "A little more steam, Jean."

The Watch of Wren's Sweetheart.

The betrothed of Sir Christopher Wren, the architect of St. Paul's cathedral, accidentally dropped her watch into a bucket of water. Knowing that her lover was an ingenious man, she sent it to him to be repaired. Wren's reply ran as follows: "Madam—The artificer, having never before mett with a drowned Watch, like an ignorant physician has been soe long about the cure that he hath made me very unquiet that your commands should be soe long deferred. However, I have sent the watch at last and envie the felicity of it, that it should be soe neer your side and soe often enjoy your Eye and be consulted by you how your Time shall pass while you employ your hands in excellent workes. But have a care of it, for I put such a Spell into it that every Beating of the Balance will tell you 'tis the pulse of my Heart which labors as much to serve you and more Trewly than the watch, for the watch I believe will sometimes lie, and sometimes perhaps be idle and unwilling to goe, having received so much injury by being in that bath that I dispair it should ever be a Trew Servant to you more. But as for me—unless you drown me too in my Teares—you may be confident I shall never cease to be your most affectionate, humble servant. Chr. Wren."

The Lesser Evil.

"So you believe in the duel?"

"I do," answered the resident in a somewhat impetuous community.

"Don't you know that the duel is a relic of barbarism?"

"I don't care. It's a heap safer than being shot at from behind a tree box."—Washington Star.
