Women as Well as Men are Made Miserable by Kidney and Bladder Trouble.

Kidney trouble preys upon the mind, discourages and lessens ambition; beauty, vigor and cheerfulness soon disappear when the kidneys are out of order or diseased.

Kidney trouble has become so prevalent that it is not uncommon for a child to be born afflicted with weak kidneys. If the child urinates too often, if the urine scalds the flesh, or if, when the child reaches an age when it should be able to control the passage, it is yet afflicted with bed-wetting, depend upon it, the cause of the difficulty is kidney trouble, and the first step should be towards the treatment of these important organs. This unpleasant trouble is due to a diseased condition of the kidneys and bladder and not to a habit as most people suppose.

Women as well as men are made miserable with kidney and bladder trouble, and both need the same great remedy. The mild and the immediate effect of Swamp-Root is soon realized. It is sold by druggists, in fifty-cent and one-dollar size bottles. You may have a sample bottle by mail free, also a pamphlet telling all about Swamp-Root, including many of the thousands of testimonial letters received from sufferers who found Swamp-Root to be just the remedy needed. In writing Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., be sure and mention this paper. Don't make any mistake, but remember the name, Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, and the address, Binghamton, N. Y., on every bottle.

Home of Swamp-Root.

Democrats, don't fail to Register on one of the two Registration Days—Tuesday, October 4th, and Tuesday, October 11th. If you are not Registered you cannot vote for the re-election of Congressman J. Harry Covington.

HER REVENGE.

How a Woman Punished an Innocent Man.

By MURIEL E. GRAY.

[Copyright, 1910, by American Press Association.]

Johanna Selfridge was unfortunate in love. She was wooed and won by Ben Tillotson, a dashing sailor lad. She loved him devotedly, but he was at heart a mean, overbearing man and treated her cruelly, especially when under the influence of liquor. His wife's ardent love was turned to bitter hate. One of his voyages having lasted four years without tidings from him, his wife concluded that he had found a watery grave.

Johanna at this time was but twenty-two years of age and a very attractive young woman. She longed to meet some one who would heal the wound, occasioned not by the loss of her husband, but by her disappointment and suffering on his account. It was not long before she met George Trevor, a man socially her superior. He had a fine way with him that was very attractive to women, and Johanna bent the knee before him. He was without fortune and had got an idea that Johanna had some money stored away. It was this and not Johanna herself that tempted him.

As there are people who are color blind, so there are people who are blind in the mater of character. Johanna was one of these character blind persons. Trevor fooled her with the greatest ease. A few flowers, which he never paid for, and a drive or two, at a livery man's expense, were quite enough to give him the victory. For a whole month Johanna reveled in a delerium of happiness intensified by the memory of her past misfortune. Then Trevor suddenly ceased his visits without even taking the trouble to make an excuse. He had discovered that she had no money.

Six months passed, during which the young widow fretted without telling any one. Some said she would never dally with the little god again some said she would go on trying till she got the right man, but not even her friends knew her feelings.

"I SHALL TAKE HER TO HER HOME."

One day a real man came along. He was forty years old, a hard worker, kind and considerate to every one and strictly honorable. He saw Johanna, learned of her past bad luck in love and proposed to her.

When it was announced that Johanna had accepted a third offer of marriage, this time from John Parke, everybody said: "Thank heaven, she has at last found a good man! John Parke is the salt of the earth."

This time Johanna kept her own counsel as to her feelings toward her lover. She didn't say whether or not she was very happy or whether she was about to marry for the sake of ending her unfortunate train of love affairs by taking a worthy if not a showy man. Her most intimate friends were at a loss just why she was intending to marry John Parke. Some said he wasn't the kind of man to produce that love the others had excited, and they didn't believe that she was very much in love. To this others replied, "Still waters run deep."

John Parke knew more about the matter than any one else, but he was not a man to have confidences. Besides, what he knew was very little. He, too, found it difficult to understand his fiancee. She was not demonstrative. But she told him that she had been demonstrative twice and that he must be content with her present treatment or give her up. Not being a very demonstrative person himself and having grown very fond of Johanna, he accepted the situation.

Johanna insisted that the wedding ceremony should be a public affair in a church. Her women friends noticed that she took no interest in collecting a trousseau and wondered why she should care to make a display in the matter of the marriage ceremony. But Johanna did not enlighten them.

When the wedding day came round every one that Johanna knew was there. All were interested to see how a woman who had been twice crushed in love would bear herself when taking a third risk. The hour was set for high noon. At the appointed time Johanna appeared in traveling costume. She met the groom at the chancel steps, and the ceremony was begun.

When that part of it wherein the groom is asked "Will you take this woman to be your wedded wife?" was put to him Parke answered in a firm voice "I will." Then the clergyman asked Johanna, "Will you take this man to be your wedded husband?" The bride, instead of replying with the accustomed "I will," answered harshly:

"No."

Had a blue bolt from heaven struck the church the astonishment could not have been greater. Having spoken the word, Johanna turned and walked defiantly down the broad center aisle of the church.

But she had scarcely started when there was another surprise. From the back of the church came a voice:

"I forbid the banns."

Johanna stopped. Her defiant look was changed in a twinkling to one of horror.

Down the aisle reeled a man in a pea jacket and sailor cap.

"I got back jus' 'n time, my dear, didn't I? In a few min'ts you'd 'a' been a bigamist."

Approaching Johanna, Ben Tillotson attempted to put his arm about her. She drew away from him as from a serpent.

The assembled guests, men and women, the clergyman, all except one person, stood transfixed with horror. That one person was John Parke. Stepping forward, he placed himself between Tillotson and Johanna.

"G'way!" roared the sailor. "She b'longs to me! Wha' right you got to her?"

"The right of escort. I brought her here, and I shall take her to her home."

John Parke had always been considered a prosaic man, but at the moment he spoke these words he looked like a god. The intruder shrank back cowed. Then the one good man whom Johanna had stabbed for the sins of two other bad ones drew her arms through his and took her out of the church.

The guests for a time remained where they were, then began silently to disperse. Not one but felt that a tragedy had been enacted before them instead of the happy event they had come to witness; not one but condemned, not one but pitied, the woman who had been driven by barbarous treatment to wreak her vengeance on an innocent man.

Tillotson found his way out among the others, every one he passed avoiding him as if he were an adder. Once out of the church he was lost in the crowd on the street. He had been wrecked on an island in the Pacific ocean and lived there with the natives, preferring to remain among them rather than return to civilization. He had finally shipped on a vessel that brought him to his own country and arrived just in time to complete the dramatic climax of his wife's revenge.

If those who had witnessed the scene in the church mingled pity with their condemnation of Johanna those who had heard of the affair—and it was a seven days' wonder—said that she had deserved far more than she had received. But one held Johanna blameless. That was the man she stabbed. Whatever may have been his inner feelings, his words said that to a woman who had been wronged as she had been wronged there must come an irresistible desire for revenge and that women, since they do not possess judicial minds, are as likely to punish the wrong man as the right one. In defense of his position he reminded those to whom he made this defense that no woman had ever been appointed to sit on a judicial bench or serve on a jury.

But as to what passed between him and Johanna on their way from the church to her home or on their arrival there or afterward John Parke spoke no word. The flippant looked upon him with that contempt one naturally feels for a man who has been duped. Others gave him sympathy. To those who had witnessed his splendid self control, his assumption of the manly part, under any and all circumstances, of protector of the weaker sex, he was a hero.

There was much speculation, much curiosity, to know the condition, mental and physical, of Johanna. She shut herself up. For a long while not even her most intimate friend was permitted to visit her. When this friend was at last admitted she found Johanna in a far better condition than she had expected, but withal unintelligible. Johanna seemed to be in a state of mental fever. Her friend had expected to find her crushed. She was emotional. Her friend had expected to find her hopeless. But not a word passed between them concerning that frightful scene of which one had been witness and in which the other had acted the principal part. Not a word of regret escaped Johanna's lips, not a word of appreciation for the man who had returned good for evil.

"It seems to me," said the lady after the visit, "that Mr. Parke is to Johanna simply as a block of stone. All the use she had for him was through him to stab the male sex. But I judge this merely from appearances. Johanna confided nothing to me."

One morning a newspaper contained an item that a man found on the street in a drunken stupor had been taken to a hospital and had died there.

The next day John Parke called on Johanna and sent up his card. She came down the stairs and entered the room so quietly that Parke, who was standing at a window, did not hear her. Presently he turned and saw her standing near the door, her hands resting on the back of a chair. She was very pale.

"Now that I have the right," he said deferentially, "I have come again to ask you to be my wife."

He made a step forward and stopped. She was trembling. She did not speak, though for a moment he thought he saw her lips move. Then she began to sway. She put out her arms to him. He ran to her and caught her only in time to prevent her from falling.
