Thanksgiving Indeed

By Ruby Douglas

THE Mortons had moved their big round dining room table into the living room by the fireplace just for the day.

"The fire will be so cheerful for our Thanksgiving dinner and then we can sit around and listen to the radio," suggested Corinne, the younger daughter.

Mrs. Morton was trying bravely to hide the grief in her heart at the absence, for the first time from their holiday table, of her son, Tom.

There was an enforced air of cheerfulness as they all set to work to lay the forks and knives and make the centerpiece of pumpkin and chrysanthemums.

Tom had disappeared more or less mysteriously from the home town and the family circle more than six months before and no one, not even his mother nor his sweetheart, Beth Arden, had heard a line from him. The fact that he was a temperamental lad and had been possessed with the belief that he was a round peg in a square hole had led all those who loved him to believe that he had merely disappeared of his own volition but had not met with accident or foul play.

When the big table was fairly groaning under its weight of food and the turkey lay brown and tempting on the platter in front of Mr. Morton's place there was not a member of the party who did not want to quote the trite old lines, "There is no fireside, howsoe'er defended, but has one vacant chair." But no one said a word about the absent Tom.

"It is so nice to be included in your family party today," said Beth as she took her seat.

"We couldn't think of anything else with your own family so far away," said Mrs. Morton, kindly.

A general discussion of drumsticks and turkey anatomy followed as each of the children tried to be polite and yet make it known to father which part he preferred.

"Tom always liked the part that goes over the fence last," piped up Johnny, the youngest Morton, regardless of the danger of bringing tears to his mother's eyes.

"He did, dear," said his mother with trembling voice. But she smiled.

"How about a little music while we eat, son," said the father after he had helped himself to what was left of the bird.

David, the family radio enthusiast, was only too eager to tune in something and drag forth from the air some of his favorite music.

"Nothing like a little good music to jazz up a family party," he said, turning the dials with masterly hand.

He got a station that advertised a good dinner program and resumed his seat.

One piece of popular music followed another with announcements in between and it was not long before the Morton family had shaken off its haunting loneliness for the absent Tom and was enjoying the program and the dinner.

Suddenly came a voice from the loudspeaker—a voice that startled every member of the family—and Beth. It was, undoubtedly, Tom Morton's voice.
