edged close to him, he saw at once from the strong resemblance between them that they must be brothers, the younger hardly more than 16. They were not unattractive faces, either of them, and in the elder's Rossiter read lines of determination and self-reliance that made him for the instant envious. Both were slimly fashioned, with a slight stoop to the shoulders, and both had the lifeless complexions of those who spend little time in the open air. They had clear eyes of steel-blue, and the hair of the elder curled slightly. He had, moreover, an insignificant brown mustache.

"Come out in the sun," said Rossiter to the one he had rescued; "it'll brace you up."

He gave the young man a helping hand, and steadied him after he had got upon his feet.

"Cripe, but I'm weak!" the whilom swimmer said. "You wouldn't think it 'ud take it out of a fellow so," and he sat down near where he had laid his clothes.

Rossiter now began to realize the condition of his own garments.

"I believe I'll have to wring my things out," he remarked, "and let them dry in the sun," and he proceeded forthwith to put this scheme into execution.

For a space little was said, the two brothers absently watching the vagrant as he spread his worn articles of apparel upon the grass. Finally the elder spoke up quickly.

"How'd you happen along just as you did?" he inquired.

"Oh, I was having a nap over yonder," answered Rossiter, waving his hand in the direction of the elm under which he had been reclining, "and I heard your brother shout."

"Having a nap eh?" this with considerable surprise, as though the speaker could not understand the philosphy of a mid-morning indulgence of that character.

"Yes, but"—with a swift shift of the topic of conversation—"you haven't told me what was the trouble with you out there," and Rossiter nodded towards the water.

"Oh, a cramp caught me. I must have been too warm when I went in. It doubled me all up on one side, and I called to Jim, who was paddlin' about in shallow water. He ran out onto the bank scart stiff, and began yellin' like mad. It's darn lucky he did, I guess."

At this the younger brother laughed foolishly.

"Say," continued the elder, "you've done me a blamed good turn——"

"Don't mention it," said Rossiter, interrupting him.

"But, by gosh, I'm goin' to!" cried the young man. "What do you take me for? Now, as I say, you've done me a good turn, and I'd like to do you one, if you'll let me."

He looked at Rossiter appealingly.

"Well," said the latter.

"You're in hard luck, ain't you? No offense meant."

Rossiter lowered his eyes.

"Suppose I am?" said he.

"Got anythin' at all to do?"

"I had an offer this morning."

"Somethin' that you care about?"

"I can't say that it is."

"Come along with us, then!" this with a sudden enthusiastic burst of confidence. "My mother 'nd sister 'nd Jim 'nd me's goin' hop-pickin'. We've just come up this mornin' from Fallsburgh down the river where we live, and are goin' into the country this afternoon. Fine place, bully 'grub,' 'nd all that. A chum o' mine was to have been along, but he backed out at the last minute, so it'll be all o. k., won't it, Jim?"

"Sure!" exclaimed the boy.

Rossiter was more than surprised at this spontaneous proposal. He was not accustomed to gratitude, and that he should inspire anyone with enough confidence to suggest such an arrangement struck him with something like amazement. But the more he meditated upon the suggestion the more tempting it was to him. Three weeks and a half had yet to elapse before the first of October. If he should decide to return and accept the offer made by his brother's acquaintance, here was an opening which would enable him to go back with a little money in his pocket, doubtless more than he could earn as a hostler.

"It's mighty good of you to mention such a thing," said he. "Are you sure you really mean it?"

"Mean it!" echoed the young man—"well, I guess!"

"Then I'm with you!" exclaimed Rossiter, surprised the instant he had spoken at his own earnestness and decision.

"My name's Joe Becraft," said the young man, "and this is my brother Jim."

"Mine is Philip Rossiter—Phil, if you like," said the vagabond, and then he was suddenly conscious that he had given his full name for the first time in three years. Ross he had been accustomed to call himself when there was any question of identity.

"Is it a good omen," he asked himself, "or is it but the beginning of another failure?"

CHAPTER III.

OFF FOR THE HOP-FIELDS.

"You see it's like this," Joe Becraft was saying as the three trudged slowly in the blazing sun across the meadow towards the city. "The mill where I've been workin' these six years, an' where Jim's just startin' in, has shut down a month for repairs, so we're gettin' a holiday. Ma always goes pickin' hops, an' Mame—she's my sister—but Jim an' me, we ain't so lucky every year."

"You like it, then?" inquired Rossiter.

"You'd better believe I do. So'd you if you were shut up in a mill all the rest of the time."

"Haven't you a good position?"

"Oh, yes, I'm not kickin'. I'm under-overseer in the cardin'-room. I'll get to be overseer, perhaps, one of these days, an' then—" He broke off. There was a happy look in his eyes and he gave a little laugh, while Jim chuckled audibly.

"What are you snickerin' at, you young jay?" cried his brother, making a pretense of being provoked, and vainly trying to cuff the offender.

The more Rossiter talked with the elder Becraft the more did he grow to respect, if not to admire, him. he was so wholly natural, so independent, so self-poised, and yet so entirely without conceit. He was uneducated, save in a rudimentary way, having been the mainstay of the family for eight years, yet he kept himself informed on the topics of the day, and had his opinions on public affairs, which were more free from bias than the views held by most of those in his station in life. Crude he was, but earnest, frank and warm-hearted, and Rossiter was shamed when he contrasted his own weakness and lack of purpose with this young fellow's unassuming strength.

As the three reached the square beyond the railway tracks, Rossiter noticed that Joe Becraft was beginning to lag and show signs of exhaustion.

"You'd better have a drink of whisky to brace you up," he said.

"A milk-shake will do the business," Becraft replied. "It's too hot for whisky. May be you'd like a nip, though," he added, with a peculiar sidelong glance, which the vagrant caught. It was as though the younger man was surmising what the elder's habits might be.

"Oh, no," Rossiter said, not betraying the fact that he noticed Becraft's scrutiny, "I'm not much on whisky myself. I like a little beer now and again, however."

"Yes, beer ain't bad, but the shake is what I need now. I feel a bit empty."

They stopped at a small corner drug store, where all three had the drink which Joe Becraft craved, though the clerk looked askance when he came to serve Rossiter.

"My mother's waitin' at the Cottage hotel," said the elder Becraft, when they again stood upon the sidewalk. "That's where the hop wagon's to come for us about two o'clock. Now before we go up, for we want you to come along with us, I've got something to propose. You'll take it all right, won't you?"

"Perhaps I know what it is," answered Rossiter, for several times he had seen Becraft furtively regarding his hair and beard.

"Do you?"

"I can guess."

"Well, if that's the case, you ain't a-goin' to mind, are you? You can pay me back, you know."

"You'll trust me to pay you back, then?"

"Trust you to? Why, of course I will. You'll pay me if you've got anythin' to pay with, an' you'll have it all right after a little."

"I don't believe there are many who would take your view of it."

"Praps not, for, to tell the truth, you ain't what the boys would call 'a swell.' But a shave an' a hair cut'll make a sight of difference. I know of a place close by where we'll go. A chap from our town keeps it."

As they turned from the main thoroughfare, which was called Keneseo street, a puff of warm wind blew a cloud of dust in their faces.

"Thunder!" ejaculated Joe Becraft, "I've swallowed enough nasty stuff for one day. Do you know," he added, "for a decent city, this town is one of the dirtiest goin'! 'Taint as bad as it used to be, but it's plenty bad enough."

Rossiter was not posted in the matter of municipal street-cleaning, so he did not reply to these observations. They had not walked more than a block when they saw a barber's striped pole, and entered a little shop where a dapper young man, with elaborately brushed hair and a not over-clean white duck jacket, was making change for a customer whom he had been shaving.

"Hullo, Joe!" said this individual, "what are you up to?"

"Oh, the mill's shut down for a few weeks, an' I'm off hop-pickin' with the family," answered Becraft. "Friend of mine, here," he continued, indicating Rossiter, "wants you to fix him up."

The barber's attention was for the first time directed to the companion of the Becraft brothers.

"Say——" he began.

"No Jollyin', now," interrupted Joe. "He took an oath a while ago that he wouldn't get a shave or hair cut till you cleaned your streets properly, but he's backed out."

The barber exploded in a guffaw.

"Lucky for him he has," he answered, "unless he means to hire out to Forepaugh or Buffalo Bill as the wild man of Borneo."

While Rossiter's locks were being trimmed and his beard removed, Joe Becraft and his tonsorial friend kept their tongues continually wagging. Their conversation had chiefly to do with the town of their nativity and a certain portion of its inhabitants, and Rossiter listened with not a little inward amusement, for each young man had, in his way, a sense of broad humor that flashed out in their comments upon people. Finally the barber's task was accomplished, and he removed the soiled apron from Rossiter's neck with a flourish and a——

"There you are, sir!"

"Gosh!" Joe Becraft exclaimed, "I wouldn't believe you were the same fellow."

The change in the vagabond's appearance was indeed great. His rather large, clear-cut features showed to an advantage without beard or mustache, and though the lines of his chin indicated a lack of decision, one studying his face for the first time would have said that its possessor was endowed with a strong individuality. His deep brown eyes were laughing and grave by turns. The discontent and bitterness which showed in the expression of his mouth were not to be seen habitually. Dissipation had left no mark upon his countenance, for although at times Rossiter had imbibed freely, he was very far from being a drunkard; indeed, he had no special taste for liquor, and had frequently resorted to it not so much because he craved it as because it took him out of himself.

Becraft produced some silver and paid his townsfellow.

"Its my treat to-day," he explained.

They now retraced their steps to Keneseo street, and followed this thoroughfare until they came to the elaborate lift-bridge spanning the Ontario canal. From time to time Becraft regarded his new friend speculatively.

"Say," he at length broke out, as the three paused and leaned over the railing, idly scanning a steam packet that was moored below, "you've been used to a different sort of life, haven't you?"

Rossiter did not reply at once.

"Yes," he said finally.

"Had an education, an' all that?"

"Yes."

"I thought so. You don't talk like—well, like most of the people I know."

"I'm not aware of any difference."

"Oh, yes, you are. That is, you would be if you'd stop to think about it."

"I got through thinking some time ago, at least I so imagined until lately."

"You know, an education," said Becraft, not heeding Rossiter's last remark, "is something I'm always wishin' I had. It's a great thing."

"I've certainly not done very much with mine," replied the wanderer.

"How'd it happen?"

"It's hard to say. I don't doubt another—you, for instance, would have profited by it, but as for me—" He ended with an expressive shrug of his shoulders.

They continued to look at the steam-packet for several minutes longer, and then resumed their walk towards the Cottage hotel.

"Don't b'lieve we'd better say anythin' about my swimmin' experience to Ma, Jim," observed Joe Becraft, as they left the main street for the narrower thoroughfare where the hotel they sought was situated. "Like as not she'd have a blue fit."

"Bet she would," replied Jim.

"She's pretty nervous about my health sometimes," Joe explained. "You see, father died o' consumption."

"Why should you say anything to her about it?" inquired Rossiter. "Certainly, so far as I am aware, there's not the slightest reason for your doing so."

"Oh, but I want her to know some day what you did for me. I'll tell her about it up in the hop-yard. She won't take on so there. I mean, she won't give it to me quite so strong about bein' careless, an' all that."

HE MADE THE DESIRED ALTERATIONS.

"Have it as you will," said Rossiter, "but I should be rather pleased if you made no mention of it whatever."

"I'm goin' to introduce you," said Joe, "as a friend who's done me a good turn. That'll explain our fetchin' you along."

Rossiter now descried in the distance the staring letters—"Cottage Hotel"—above a large and rambling wooden building, so he intimated that before he met the mother and sister of his companions he would like to make a slight change in his apparel.

"I've got another shirt in here," he said, displaying his bundle, "that looks more presentable than this one I'm wearing."

BADGER AS A FIREMAN.

The Animal Put Out Blaze as Coolly and Skillfully as a Person Would.

A badger, which had made its home among the granite cliffs, dealt with the fire god with sagacity and skill, says Nature. A friend, while painting a sea piece, discovered a badger's lair, and thought to play the animal a practical joke. Gathering together a bundle of grass and weeds, he placed it inside the mouth of the hole and, igniting it with a match, waited for the ignominious flight of the astonished householder. But Master Badger was a resourceful animal, and not disposed to be made a butt of practical jokers.

He came up from the depths of his hole as soon as the penetrating smoke told him that there was a fire on the premises, and deliberately scratched earth on the burning grass with his strong claws until all danger was past. No human skill could have grasped the situation more quickly, or displayed greater skill in dealing with an unfamiliar event.

A Severe Rebuke.

A doctor in Devil's Lake, N. D., sent a dunning letter which chanced to reach the wrong man. Here is the reply: "Dear Sur: This note was put in my box by mistake. I han't the man, hee's dead, and ain't any relative of mine anyway. How dose your conshens let you dun the dead? Why don't you lead a better criston life and try to meet that man in heaven which is worth more than forty dollars to any doctor."

DAISY FARM
Squashville, Maryland

SYLVESTER CUTERICORN,

TURKEYVILLE,

VIRGINIA.

For $1.50 or $2.00 any farmer can get enough paper and envelopes with a Business Card printed on each, to last him a year.

The Post Office Department requests that persons should have printed or written on all envelopes, the name and address of the writer. This will save much time in the returning of a missent letter, as it lays 30 days in the post office before going to the Dead Letter Office, and is usually delayed 30 days longer there before it is returned. There are many cases of wrongly-directed letters containing checks and money orders, where a prompt return would remove the cause of much worry and delay in business matters. Call and see what we can do for you.
