TO HONOR RUMSEY AS INVENTOR OF STEAMBOAT

Born In Cecil County—To Erect Marker At Birthplace

After many years, Maryland is going to memorialize a native son, George Washington, and others, recognized as the inventor of the first steamboat.

The State Historical Society is planning several celebrations and will erect a marker near the birthplace of the inventor, James Rumsey, soldier, mechanic and dreamer, who made steam propel a boat 150 years ago.

Rumsey was born on Bohemi. Manor in Cecil county, in March, 1743. A century and half ago, on December 3, 1787, he publicly demonstrated a workable steamboat on the Potomac River at Sheperdstown, W. Va.

The Rumseyan Society of West Virginia is planning a celebration marking the sesquicentennial of Rumsey's public triumph, Maryland will join in that celebration in addition to her own observances.

J. Alexis Shriver, secretary of the Historical Society, announced the inscription of the marker to be erected near Rumsey's birthplace would be as follows:

JAMES RUMSEY
The Inventor of the Steamboat
Was Born 1743 Two Miles North
Of This Point in "Middle Neck"
GEORGE WASHINGTON
Showed Much Interest in Rumsey's Experiments and Made Him Superintendent of
"The Potomac Company"

The marker, similar to those at other historical spots in Maryland, will be erected by the State Road Commission. Surmounted by the Maryland coat of arms, it will be of metal with black lettering on a white background.

The unveiling of the marker near Warwick next month by the Cecil County Historical Society will mark the beginning of a series of observances commemorating Rumsey's contribution to science and navigation. The Delaware Historical Society also will participate in the marker's unveiling.

Shriver explained Washington not only recognized Rumsey as the inventor of the steamboat, but also made him superintendent of the Potomac Navigation Company at Shenandoah Falls (Harper's Ferry). Washington was president of that company.

Historical data compiled by Anita Buchanan Speer, executive secretary of the Rumseyan Society, show that Washington gave Rumsey credit for the invention in 1784, a full year before John Fitch submitted his first steamboat plans.

Robert Fulton, a friend of Rumsey, who is generally credited with making the steamboat a commercial success, submitted his first plans a year after Rumsey's death on Dec. 21, 1792, the society's records show.
