Early Plows Much Like "Dragging Cat By Tail"

The early plows fell far short of the modern dictionary definition—"An implement to cut, lift, invert, and partly pulverize the soil." Even as late as 1850 plows failed to cut and turn a clean furrow. "They rooted, but would not invert, the soil."

In the South the shovel plow was used almost universally until some years after the Civil War. Records in the Bureau of Agricultural Engineering show they were" made of wrought iron in the shape of * * * an Irish shovel with a loop on the backside for the stock to enter. They generally are made by the blacksmith on the plantation where they are used. They are drawn through the ground with one horse or a mule * * * throwing the dirt both ways. It is pretty much like dragging a cat by the tail."

The "Old Colony" plow used in the United States about 1820, reports the 1899 Department of Agriculture Yearbook, left furrows standing up "like the ribs of a lean horse in the month of March. A lazy plowman might sit on the beam and count every bout (circuit) of his day's work."

Los Angeles jobhunters wondered if this was a typographical error: "Wanted: part time stenographer."

—o—

Eleanor Whitney, Paramount dance star is sporting a new set of furs and refuses to reveal the identity of the donor.

—o—

So successful was the combination of Carole Lombard and Fred MacMurray in "Hands Across the Table" with audiences that they will be teamed again in "Hard to Handle."

—o—

Hollywood is returning to the reliable old melodrama, complete with villains, auto chases and all the other trimmings that go to make walloping entertainment. The heroines are as pure as they are beautiful and the leading men are heroes, as anyone can see by their shirts thrown open at the throat.

—o—

A survey at Paramount finds Fred MacMurray at the helm of a roaring motorcycle, breaking through traffic in pursuit of Robert Young and Claudette Colbert in "The Bride Comes Home." Even the glamorous Marlene Dietrich gets chased in "Desire" when she and Gary Cooper are run down by the gendarmie on motorbikes.

—o—

The songs of Gladys Swarthout and John Boles are interspersed with thundering hoofs as the lovers elude the vigilantes in "Rose of the Ranchoe." Motorboat, horseboat and auto chase are used in "Woman Trap" as Gertrude Michael and George Murphy track down their quarry.

—o—

"Rose Marie" at M-G-M is a musical, but there's foul play afoot in the big forest fire scene. And at the same studio, melodramtic shivers are on tap in "Three Live Ghosts." "It had to Happen," still under way at 20th Century-Fox, is another major hair-raiser.

—o—

John Boles is having a time of it as an American courier through Cuban swamps with Spanish snipers at his heels in "A Message to Garcia."

—o—

Preparations are underway at United Artists to put in production as soon as Douglas Fairbanks arrives in Hollywood, the story "Marco Polo." Samuel Goldwyn disclosed that Fairbanks has been doing research work for more than a half a year on "Marco Polo" and now has a completed script ready to go before the cameras on short notice.

Greta Garbo's true name is Greta Gustaffson. Yet for ten years she has been known as Garbo. In all this time, few if any persons have known why she took the name of Garbo. During the past summer when she visited her home in Sweden, an ambitious Swedish newspaperman, unable to win an interview with her spent the day tracking down the origin of her name, Garbo. Although everyone knew it was bestowed upon her by Mauritz Stiller, her first director and discoverer, the meaning of the word has been a mystery for ten years. But a dilligent search through mythology has now revealed that "Garbo is a Norwegian word meaning "A mysterious being that comes out at night to dance in the moonlight.

Casting for "Romeo and Juliet" has begun and as yet no Romeo has been signed, but your correspondent has reason to believe that handsome, young actor, Robe Taylor, who really made the pulses of the ladies fluctuate so rapidly in "Broadway Melody of 1936", will play Romeo. Edna May Oliver has been chosen to play the role of Juliet's maid.
