TALKS to MOTHERS about THEIR BABIES

By DR. J. H. MASON KNOX, JR.,

Chief, Bureau of Child Hygiene, Maryland State Department of Health.

CLOTHING.

Reprinted by permission of the Baltimore Sun.

THE clothing of the young baby should be simple, warm and sufficiently loose as not to bind. It should be adapted to the climate and not to the season of the year; that is, on a chilly, rainy day in midsummer the baby must be as warmly dressed as on a mild sunny day in early spring. Small and weakly infants need warmer clothing than do sturdy ones.

At any time if the baby's hands and feet are cold and he looks pinched and blue, he needs more clothing. On the other hand, if he is continually perspiring and his body is moist, he has too much.

All clothing should be simple. Elaborate decoration can more profitably be confined to doll babies, where perhaps it does no harm. The following articles are considered essential in this part of the world, although, of course, we must recognize that in other countries babies are satisfactorily clothed in a different manners.

Abdominal Bands.

ABDOMINAL bands are made of unhemmed strips of part wool or whole wool-flannel about 6 to 8 inches wide and 18 inches to 20 inches long. They are used to hold the navel dressing in place and should be adjusted snugly, but not tight enough to bind. One thickness of flannel over the abdomen is sufficient. The band should be fastened at one side, not at the back or front. It is important that it should not be so low as to interfere with the movements of the baby's legs or so high as to constrict the chest. A surgical gauze bandage can take the place of the flannel binder; in any case it should be dispensed with in three or four weeks and a loose knitted band of silk and wool or in summer of cotton material, with shoulder straps substituted for it. Usually four binders are required.

Shirts.

THE baby's shirt should be of silk and wool or cotton and wool material opened in front. It should be long enough that the sleeves slip easily on and off. A shirt of light gauze material can be used in summer, but the sleeves should be long in summer as well as in winter. Three shirts are needed.

Skirt.

THE next article of clothing is a flannel skirt. It is usually made of all-wool flannel or part wool, selecting the lightest weight for hot weather. It is held on by straps over the shoulders and should be about 26 inches long, that is, not more than 10 inches below the baby's feet. It is quite practical to have this garment made with a muslin waist attached to a flannel skirt. In this way, the flannel part can be used indefinitely. Three flannel skirts are sufficient.

Dress Or Slip.

THIS should be made of fine cotton material, such as nainsook or batiste. The dress should be about 27 inches long, simply made, without embroidery, the neck loose, but held with a draw string. Draw strings at the wrist are sometimes used, but are not advisable. From four to six dresses are required.

Night Gowns.

THE nightgowns should be of different weight for hot and cold weather. Stockinet or flannelette is the approved material, although any soft material may be used. They should be open all the way down the front, and for young babies it is well to have them drawn up at the feet with a string. It is well to have four nightgowns.

Sleeping Bags.

WHENEVER the baby will not remain wrapped up in blankets all night the sleeping bag is advisable. They are made from a single blanket, folded in the middle, crosswise, and then sewed together at one end and one side, and fastened in two places on top with hooks and eyes. The baby is then put inside the bag and it is fastened over each shoulder. In the summer the bag can be made of muslin or outing flannel.

A second and simpler plan is to cut a slit in the middle of an old blanket wide enough to permit it to slip easily over the baby's head. The edges are bound and the blanket is put over the head, smoothed down and the lower corners fastened with safety pins. By this arrangement the baby can be changed without taking him out of the blankets. A night cap may be needed in cold weather.

Stockings.

THE baby in long clothes whose feet keep warm does not need stockings, but in cold weather it is usually advisable to have stockings in addition to the skirts and blankets. Three pairs are sufficient and they should contain some wool and should have a loop of tape at the side for attachment to the diaper.

Diapers.

BIRDSEYE is the approved material for the baby's napkins. Stockinet is more absorbent, but also more expensive. The material should be cut to suit the size of the baby. Twenty-two by forty-four inches is perhaps the average size. Packages of napkins already hemmed are easily procurable. In putting on the napkin it should never be tight enough to pinch the baby's stomach or legs. A small inside cloth about five inches square is often placed next to the baby inside of the napkin for protection. About three dozen napkins are required.

The care of the napkins is important. Wet napkins should be placed at once in a covered pail and left to soak in cold water until they can be washed. All solid discharges should be removed from the soiled napkin. These should then be rinsed through several waters, when they can be washed with the wet napkins. All the napkins must be washed in hot water, with plenty of a mild white soap. No washing powder of any sort is advised. They should be well boiled and rinsed through several waters.

Much of the irritation of the thighs and buttocks of young babies, which is the source of much suffering, is caused by insufficient rinsing of the napkins. Whenever possible the napkins should be dried in the sunshine and open air. During the day the napkin should be changed as often as it is wet or soiled. In the night it should be changed whenever the baby is taken up to be fed. Water-proof diapers are sometimes a convenience. They are suitable, however, only for temporary use, as they retain the heat and moisture and often lead to much irritation.

Outdoor Clothing.

THE baby exercises little and when taken out in cold weather should be warmly wrapped. For the first three months this can be done best by a shawl or blanket. When it begins to sit up a cloak or a sweater of warm material is advisable. Mittens should be provided for the hands, and a cap, not thick enough to cause the head to perspire.

Long clothes should never be continued after six months, and in summer time they can be dispensed with much earlier or omitted entirely.

TOWERS CHOICE OF G. O. P. FOR COMPTROLLER

State Senator Lawrence B. Towers of Caroline County will be the Republican candidate for Comptroller should he accept a proferred nomination. He is the choice of William P. Jackson, who has indicated his belief that Senator Towers would be a strong candidate. This view is shared by Senator Weller and Chairman Galen L. Tait, who are willing to endorse Jackson's suggestion.

Senator Towers, who is a brother of Albert G. Towers, president of the Title Trust and Guarantee Company and former chairman of the Public Service Commission, is one of the best known Republicans on the Eastern Shore. His popularity in his home county is indicated by the fact that in the Democratic sweep in 1922 he alone of the legislative candidates was elected, his three colleagues in the lower house being Democrats. He also was popular at Annapolis during the legislative session. While an uncompromising Republican, he was one of the most independent of the Senators.

Suggestion Telegraphed

The suggestion that Towers be tendered the nomination came from Senator Jackson in a telegram addressed to Chairman Tait, who had conferred with him relative to the completion of the ticket, following Mr. Armstrong's acceptance of the gubernatorial nomination.

FARMERS URGED TO CLEAN SEED WHEAT

College Park, June 28.—Pointing to the fact that 95 per cent of all Maryland wheat contains garlic and that 76 per cent of it contains other weed seeds which result in lowering the grade of the product and consequently lowering the price, the Agronomy Department of the University of Maryland Experiment Station is urging farmers to clean their seed wheat in an effort to eliminate these costly impurities.

Garlic, according to the statement, is hard to eradicate, but it can never be eliminated from the wheat fields of the state so long as it is planted with the wheat each year. Rye and corn cockle, two other troublesome weeds, however, can readily be banished if the wheat selected for seed is free of them.

It is recommended that farmers who save their own wheat for seed should select an area sufficiently large to meet their requirements and then go through this part of the field and pull the undesirable plants. It is only necessary to cut off the rye about the time it comes in head and pull the corn cockle when it is in the blossom stage.

If these two weeds were entirely eliminated from Maryland wheat the value of the yearly crop would be increased $300,000 it is pointed out, while if garlic were eradicated, $600,000 more would be added to the yearly value of the crop.

The area planted to wheat each year in Maryland is about 600,000 acres, necessitating about 54,000 acres for seed purposes, or an average of about 1.25 acres per farm. The cost of cleaning this much wheat for seed by the method suggested would be less than the labor of one man for one day on each farm, it is stated, and in the improvement of the quality of the crop would be worth about $16 per acre for each acre planted for seed.
