ARE WE BUILDING ONLY FOR TODAY?

"Who builds for the present, builds only for the past," was not written of good roads, but is as true of them as of temples and meeting halls. The organization which, knowing it is growing, builds only for its present membership, soon finds it has built too small. The "present," which soon comes, brings a membership too big for the building.

The hard road built just big enough, wide enough, strong enough, well enough for today's traffic; is built for tomorrow, too, only when it is known that the traffic does not, cannot grow.

But there are few places where traffic does not grow.

The village of today is the thriving town of tomorrow. The town of today is the big city of tomorrow, and the big city of the immediate moment becomes the huge city of the next one.

When the Boston Post Road was built, no such thing as the "capacity of a road" was known. But today, this road, among many, is strained against its capacity limits most of the time, and always on Sundays and holidays. The good roads connecting any two large cities of the nation; Boston and New York, New York and Albany, Baltimore and Philadelphia, Cleveland and Toledo, Chicago and Detroit, to mention only a few, are often inadequate to carry the traffic, but at greatly reduced speed, and speed is as much a part of transport as motion.

New roads should always be built for tomorrow; never for today. For "tomorrow" soon becomes "today," and the road, big enough and to spare for present needs, is speedily used up to its capacity. To paraphrase the quotation, "Only he who builds for the future, builds for the present."
