Exception to the Trend

Not long ago, Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that prices in general had touched a record high.

There is considerable argument as to whether this barometer or any other can be considered an accurate reflection of the cost of living. However, without arguing that point, it is a notable fact that one basic bud get item has been going against the general trend so far as price is concerned.

That item is beef. As August ended, the American Meat Institute reported, "Consumers are buying more beef this year than at any tie in history—and at low prices—as a result of the bountiful cattle supply. This more than offsets the sharp decline in pork supplies which in turn has resulted in seasonal price increases for some pork cuts.

"America suddenly has switched this year from a 'pork' to a 'beef' eating coun try. Per capita beef consump tion is expected to increase from 61.2 pounds in 1952 to 74 pounds this year, while per capita pork consuption is expected to decrease from 71.6 pounds to 60.5"

As o fa recent date, retail beef prices were running more than 20 per cent below the levels of the comparable date last year in the typical Chicago market. This was true in all kinds of stores—individually owned, chains, cash and carry, and charge and delivery.

It's the old story of supply and demand at work in a free, competitive market. The price trends to go down, the supply goes up. And the consumer, naturally, absorbs more of a desired commodity when his dollar buys more.
