More on Soviet Living Standards

A number of analyses have been made of living standards in Soviet Russia. One of the most thorough and authoritative was conducted at Columbia University, and its conclusions have just been released.

The researchers studied the prices Soviet citizens pay for goods in the state stores and related them to in come , and thus arrived at these citizens' "real wages." The conditions obtaining in various periods, beginnng with 1926, were compared. Here is a summation of what was learned: According to our calculations, the Soviet worker after the five-year plans has never been as well off in terms of real wages as he was in 1928. One of cur calculations, perhaps perhaps theoretically the more defensible, shows he is still far worse off than in 1928."

Many reasons can be advanced why this should be so. One of the most important, certainly, lies in the very nature of the communist economic philosophy. The state owns or controls all the agencies of production and distribution. It sets by fiat the price the shopper must pay, and it normally includes a huge profit in order to siphon off purchasing power. There is no competition in any reasonable sense of the word.

That is a sure way to hold down living standards. By contrast, the highest living standards exist here in America where all enterprise, starting with producers and winding up with retailers, is in everlasting competition for consumer favor.

Can Production Keep Pace?

During the next few years consumers may expect plentiful supplies of meat—and live stock producers are assured of a steadily increasing market. That optimistic forecast, which has a solid basis in fact, has been made by the American Meat Institute.

Our cattle herd is now the largest in our history—nearly 95,000,000 head—and the all-time beef production record established in 1953 is expected to be substantially bettered this year. Also, favorable hog-corn price ration are expanding hog production, after two years of curtailment, and this ,it is believed, will be reflected in increased marketings late this summer and in the fall.

It might seem that a huge and increasing livestock population on the farms and ranches could in itself result in price and marketing difficulties for producers. The answer to that lies in the population trend. If meat consumpion is to be maintained at the present figure of about 150 pounds per capita, production will have to be steadily increased as the years pass, rising by 15 per cent in the next 10 years alone. As the Institute official put it, " . . . . the real problem facing the livestock and meat industry over the next decade or so is whether, with our human population increasing rapidly, ranchers and farmers can produce enough animals to keep pace."
