BRIDGE.

What is Said to Constitute an Accomplished Player.

This is a popular pastime and much of the attention of our best minds in high society is concentrated upon guessing whether or not a given card is in the hand of a person on his right or on his left. In order to be an accomplished bridge player one must possess the following attributes:

1. A dress suit. (This does not apply to ladies.)
2. A roll of clean bills with a rubber band encircling them.
3. A cigarette.
4. A stoical, bland and unimpassioned nature.
5. A piece of paper and pencil.
6. A partner, usually of the opposite sex.

You may, with delicacy, criticise nearly every play your partner makes. She doubtless deserves it; but, as a rule, this criticism should not extend beyond her prowess as a player. Try to remember that a gentleman is one who never unintentionally insults anybody.

Bridge should never be played seriously. One should carry on an animated conversation during the course of play. It is customary, too, to hold the cards in one hand, and a hot buttered muffin in the other. Get up from the table rather frequently and telephone, receive visitors, give orders to the servants and pour tea. The questions, "Who led?" "What are trumps?" "Is that my trick," etc., are always permissible and lend some spirit to what otherwise might prove a dull game.

In playing bridge with two ladies, a man should be careful to play "highest man and highest woman." In this way he will be playing against a man, and his chance of being recompensed for his winnings will be less remote. Never play with three ladies.

When you are dummy and your partner has finished playing the hand, you should invariably glare at her (or him) and make one of the following marks:

1. You played it the only way to lose the odd!
2. Why, in heaven's name, didn't you get out the trumps?
3. You must lose a pot of money at this game, don't you?
4. It's lucky I'm not playing 10-cent points.
5. Why not take your finesse the other way?
6. The eight of clubs was good, you know!
7. Yes, if you had played your ace of diamonds we would have saved it.
8. It's a pity you didn't open the hearts.—Metropolitan Magazine.

SENATOR RAYNER'S SPEECH.

Senator Rayner of Maryland delivered a brilliant and impassioned address in the Senate last Thursday. His subject was "Modern States Rights."

The following were important points made in the speech:

The rights of the States must be maintained inviolate, as intended by the framers of the Constitution.

The doctrine that corporations should be limited in the amount of the product they consign into other states is a monstrous proposition. That would finally place every commercial transaction and every business enterprise under Federal supervision.

The people should be made to understand that their representatives in this body still have a glimmering recollection of what the Constitution means.

The trouble with the President is that he regards himself as vested with unlimited executive power under the Constitution.

I believe in the coming contest we ought to plant our colors (Democratic) upon the Tenth Amendment and make the contest clear and clean between the reserved rights of the States on one hand and the Federalism and centralization on the other.
