Silver Stainless Steel

New York, Dec. 6—First pieces of a new metal, silver stainless steel, were exhibited today at the Exposition of Chemical Industries.

The silver steel is the usual stainless steel, to which is added one-quarter of one per cent of silver, in a way that permeates the entire metal with silver particles so fine that one of them has to be magnified about 500 times to be visible.

A sheet of this metal, the size of a medium bedroom mirror and nearly as bright, and some commercial castings that look like silver, are shown. With them goes the story of an unexpected list of far-reaching industrial improvements promised by this metal.

Discovery of the process for making the silver stainless was announced last May, the work of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology men, done for the Chemical Foundation, Inc. The latter and two steel companies—the Lebannon Steel Foundry of Lebanon, Pa., and the Eastern Rolling Mills of Baltimore—show the first commercial results today.

They have gone beyond expectations. The original discovery was that silver-impregnated stainless steel was immune in the laboratory to salt water pit corrosion, the one kind of natural rust to which stainless steel was known to be susceptible.

It now appears the new metal resists also various chemical corrosives that attack stainless steels. One is a wool dye chemical which in four hours ate away four per cent of the weight of ordinary "eighteen eight" stainless steel, and when molybdenum, the usual protective metal, was added, still dissolved five hundredths of one per cent of the steel.

The new silver stainless steel, in the same period, was completely untouched. It also showed not the slightest corrosion with immersion in muriatic acid and ferris chloride alongside stainless steel, which in the same period of time was nearly eaten through.

It was explained these chemical resistant properties promise new facilities for greater varieties of color and faster colors in dyeing dress goods. The coming of stainles ssteel a few years ago made possible vats which could be cleaned quickly, and speeded the color-making.

But now chemists are inventing better and faster dyes which have begun to eat away even some of the stainless steels.

The silver stainless steel was produced originally to meet problems of the U. S. Navy, and more than 80 castings of the new metel ware said by the makers to be already under test in Navy experiments.

The Slow Driver Menace

The slow driver, who pokes along the highways in complete disregard of the congestion caused by his selfishness, is assailed as a menace by the Keystone Automobile Club.

"We frequently have been asked, 'What percentage of week-end traffic accidents is due to slow driving?'" said Matthew P. Hanley, Manage rof the Eastern Shore Division of the Club. "The question cannot be answered statistically, because accident analysis deals only with immediate causes, but it unquestionably is true that the slow driver is a factor in many accidents, patricularly on week ends when traffic is at its peak.

"His (or her) part in the accident picture is this: A slow-moving car on a two-lane highway interferes with the free movement of other vehicles, which, held to a pace far below the limits allowed by law, soon form long lines behind the pace-maker. Impatience of drivers increases with every mile of such slow progress, and exasperation finds outlet in dangerous passing attempts.

"There probably isn't a motorist in the State who has not experienced trying moments in week-end driving because of the selfishness of some fellow drivers. The slow, or 'poky', driver may think he is playing it safe by creeping along at a 20-mile rate, but actually he is creating one of the worst of highway hazards.

"If all motorists drive at a rate permitted by law and conditions of the road, orderly, safe traffic movement will result."
