NATURE'S CLAVILUX

By H. A. F. Penniman

Each passing month has a color in my mind—
The rainbow's glowing tints are all too few
To paint these changing spirits as they grant
A glimpse—a flash—before we're left behind.

Brown November is my New Year, when leaves
Are dead, and city streets seem gay with promise
Of who knows what of new around each corner;
December shines in silver-frosted white,
Trimmed in evergreen and wreathed with holly;
January trails sophisticated black,
Artificial, sleek, with flashing signs for stars;
February's gray—dull, dark, depressing—
White March streams with gaudy blue and scarlet
Like a thousand tattered flags in a gale.

April's pink and lilac—flowery, floating pink;
Pale green for May, delicate and airy;
June is draped in blue—azure—turquois—blue
Of all the opal lights in sky or water;
July's a minx—her scanty draperies
Are yellow; where they are not flaming red;
Deeper far is August crimson, whose fringes
Are mauve, hinting of the misty purple
That makes September seem a poet's dream,
While with October's brilliant gold and orange
The glory of poor year has reached its end—
At best the guile of Indian summer brings
A passing flush. The color notes are drab
Till Spring returns

POULTRY

SUCESS IN POULTRY BUSINESS DEPENDS MORE ON MAN THAN ANY OTHER REASON —OTHER COMMENT

The man who said, "A person succeeds in exactly the same proportion that he mingles his thoughts with his labors" did not necessarily mean the poultry business, but his statement applies to that business just as strongly as to any other business. Failure in the poultry business is due, in a great many cases, because the man failed to mingle his thought with his labor, and not because he failed to put into the business a sufficient amount of energy and enthusiasm. If one will mingle his thought with his labor he will find that many chasms that, on the surface, seem impossible to cross or overcome, can be mastered quite easily. Every day, in the poultry business, obstacles arise that must be met and overcome if we will make a success. You can't expect them to come out all right because you want them to; things don't happen that way. Obstacles must be overcome in the handicap of life, or they will overcome you. The shore of life is strewn with the wreckage of failures of men who have failed to mingle their thought with their labor.

In the hum-drum of busy life, people forget the real philosophy of life, and in the rush for gold and gain fall into the abyss of physical ruin and mental decay. We see the visions of gain and lose sight of the main purpose of life. And in the rush that necessity puts us to exert we fail to realize that we are unable to give to our work the amount of thought that is necessary to make it the success it should be.

There are thousands of people, particularly in the cities, who long for a chance to establish themselves in the chicken business and are obsessed with the belief that if they could acquire a small poultry farm their way would be paved to an independent existence of ease and luxury. For such people the attacks of hen fever are of yearly occurrence, following closely upon the exposure of germs of this malady at the big city poultry shows and by the reading of alluring advertisements in poultry books purchased at ten-cent stores, which picture the business as a money-making scheme rather than as a business, which requires an unending amount of knowledge and considerable funds before you can make of it the success that is claimed.

About nine out of ten that begin the business make a feeble start, find that it is not what they thought and quit. They fail to take into consideration the fundamentals of success in any business, which are the giving of that business the amount of thought or brain that is necessary to make of it a success.

The greatest profit in the chicken business to the average person lies in the selling of November and December eggs. Consequently, the ones who followed our advice last winter and hatched in February and March are the ones who will make the most money. True it is you had to use high-priced eggs to get these early pullets and it was hard on you getting up nights and bothering with brooder fires and a dozen or so other hardships that go in the raising of February and March chicks, but you will, in the end, reap the profits. The ones whose chicks came out in April will not be far behind the March chicks and will bring a good profit to the owners, while the ones hatched in early May, and if they grow properly, will also be profitable. But for all-around, general profit, give me the ones hatched in February or March, if you are equipped handle them with the proper care.

Those of our readers who contemplate keeping poultry this winter would do well to plant some mangels for winter green feeding. Almost any kind of mangel will do well, although some prefer the Red Mammoth on account of their size. Mangels make good green feed and if you will get some in the ground now, and feed your chickens with them next winter, after you have housed them, you will remember this column with thanks at the results you will get. They are far better than cabbage or any other feed of this nature and will pay you well to feed them. In the spring and summer the chickens are allowed to roam at will and, consequently, they secure their green feed and meat, in the form of worms. When housed next fall this is all cut off and you must replace it. Good beef scrap supplies the meat and mangels the green feed. Feed them correctly and you will get good results.

Sell off your cockerels as quickly as possible and make room for the pullets to grow big and husky. It is surprising how soon and quickly the pullets will get big if you will give them room. The habit of allowing the cockerels to remain until they reach two and three pounds is a mistake. Pick out your cockerels for next year and sell off the rest as soon as they reach a pound and a half anyhow.
