SIX A. M.

He opens his eyes, with a cry of delight.
There's a toyshop all round him, a wonderful sight!
The fairies have certainly called in the night.

EIGHT A. M.

They are quiet at first—both the girls and the boys,
Too happy to make any riot or noise,
And they mentally show to each other their toys.

SIX P. M.

But see! In the nursery a terrible racket!
The dolls lose their heads, there are rents in each jacket,
And if you've a toy it's the fashion to crack it.

EIGHT P. M.

The floor is all littered with signs of the fray.
He is sulky and tired with much eating and play,
And nurse, too, is cross as she bears him away.

CHRISTMAS EVE IN PARIS.

Forget and Forgive Is the Custom—Midnight Mass and the Family Supper.

On Christmas eve in the homes of Paris, when the children are fast asleep, with the bonnes to watch over them, the older ones and the parents go to the grand high mass, lasting from 10 o'clock till midnight. This is a very solemn service and is sung with great ceremony and with row upon row of white veiled nuns, whose narrow belts of blue, orange or red show their peculiar order, kneeling in the transept.

Just at midnight the mass ends, and the altar boys snuff the tall candles.

Then the family returns, and there is the reveillon, or the supper of waking—the one meal of the year at which are gathered the brothers and sisters to the home of the oldest married child. There are places for the grandparents, too, and, if a child has been lately born to swell the family circle, a seat of honor next the grandmere for its mother, who is queen of the feast.

The "supper" is a great dinner, at which good will is the order, where are drunk innumerable glasses of harmless, unintoxicating grape wine, and where toasts are offered to every conceivable good luck, past and to come.

At the reveillon are discussed all the affairs of the family. If during the year the relations between two of its members have become strained, all is often forgiven and forgotten in this family love feast.

So with toast and rally and story the hours creep by until it is far into the small hours, when the party breaks up.—New York Press.

English Christmas Customs.

In England comparatively modern customs are almost identical with the Roman feasts—to wit, the plight in which old Cheshire farmers used to be at Christmas. At this season they were obliged to do their own work, for the servants were only engaged from Jan. 1 to Dec. 24, which plan gave them a week's holiday. This they employed in flocking to the towns, where they spent their money in revelry.—Exchange.
