WHAT'S IN McCLURE'S.

The July McClure's is a good, hearty and satisfying literary meal—some good articles on new things the world is doing, some important ones on vital topics of the day, and a good share of brisk and entertaining stories; the whole well served with attractive illustrations, many in colors.

Ray Stannard Baker's "New Music for An Old World," describing Dr. Thaddeus Cahill's marvelous instrument for producing music by electricity, the dynamophone, is full of suggestion and interest for both the musically and scientifically inclined. We have had many superficial descriptions of the San Francisco earthquake, but Henry Anderson Lafler's record of experiences and the impressions in "My Sixty Sleepless Hours" written on the spot, and at the time of the fire, touches the real heart of the event. The beginnings of the corrupt methods that result in the recent insurance scandals are interestingly shown by Burton J. Hendrick in the third installment of the "Story of Life-Insurance" in which he tells the career of Henry Baldwin Hyde, the founder of the Equitable. The ninth instalment of Carl Schurt'z "Reminiscences of a Long Life" contains some interesting impressions of Mazzini, the Italian patriot, and Kossuth, the Hungarian. Kipling's sturdy and imaginative stories of Old England continue with the life of Parnesius, the Roman legionary, telling how he was given command of the foaces on the Great Wall and fought successfully "The Winged Hats" (the Danes). Non-motorists and perhaps experts as well will have their first motoring sensations brought back to them vividly and amusingly by Julian Street's "My Enemy—the Motor." James Hopper has a story of the Philippines, "Caybigan" which is full of color and power. "The Generous Mr. Dean," by Abby Meguire Roach is an amusing character story with a little moral in its tail and "The Still of Ballywan," by Stella F. Wynne; is full of fine Irish wit. "At the top of the Road," by H. B. Going and "The Home Wind," are poems worth reading and remembering. Andre Castaigne's pictures for the Kipling tale are stories in themselves, so full they are of information and the spirit and flesh and life or the time.

Recalled the Name at Last.

The stage coach that carries the mail between Kent's Hill and Readfield station in Maine, drew up along the roadside and the driver accosted a little old man working in the field. "Do you know who Mrs. Abby B. Brown is and where she lives?"

The old man considered. "Brown, Abby B. Brown," he repeated. "You don't mean Mrs. Polly Brown, do you:"

"No, Mrs. Abby B. Brown; we've got a letter for her."

"B, you say the middle letter is B, do you? I know a whole lot of Browns that live on the other side of the road, but there ain't any Abby B. among them. You don't mean Abby B. Smith, do you? She lives over—"

"No, it's Abby B. Brown. We'll find her somehow. Thanks."

The stage driver started his horses, but before the corner was reached a faint "Hello" caused the passenger to turn around. The old man, hoe in hand was pursuing the stage. "Brown, Mrs. B. Brown, did you say? Why, I know her. She's my wife."

A Woman is Never Old

Who allows herself to think only of pleasant things.

Who trains her tongue to utter only pleasant words.

Who remembers that frowns are unbecoming and that smiles are better.

Who keeps her nerve well under control and remembers that they are not an interesting subject to any one.

Who enters into the plans and, as far as possible, into the doings of the young people about her.

Who never allows herself to become slouchy and careless in her appearance.

Who tre·ts others as she likes to be cared for herself, and never demands too much from her friends.
