CITY OF THE FUTURE.

Vision of the Change That May Come Through the Motorcar.

Segregation of traffic was practically unknown before 1900. When the motorcar came it was obvious enough that the eight mile an hour truck and the twenty mile an hour pleasure car could not simultaneously run on the same densely packed avenue. Not the fastest, but the slowest, vehicle determines the speed of a congested street's traffic. This conclusion then is justified: In the city of the future there will be separate streets for the fast pleasure or passenger motorcar and for the slow commercial motor truck.

Moreover, trucks are increasing in weight so that ordinary pavements cannot support the heaviest that can be built. It is very evident that the city must provide one type of street for the fast pleasure car and still another for the heavier, slower truck.

New York, Philadelphia, Boston, London, Paris and Berlin have found subways preferable to elevated structures for rapid transit railways for very much the same reasons that confront us even now with the increasing use of the motorcar, and we may expect that motor truck subways will be provided in the congested city of the future. There are straws enough to show that this is the tendency of thought among municipal engineers.

It becomes safe to prophesy that the city of the future will provide highways for its heavy motor trucks deep in the ground. Swift passenger motors will speed along in the sunshine unobstructed and undelayed.

So the city of the future, the city that the motorcar will bring into being, will be pleasantly different from that compact aggregation of towering office buildings and dwellings painted by romancers. It will be an open, sunny city, its outskirts thirty miles from its commercial center; its suburbs, if suburbs they can be called, sixty or a hundred miles distant and easily reached by trains perhaps twice as fast as those which now convey us to our work. There will be no slums in that motor city, for slums are created by high land values, which cannot be leveled so long as this is a horse ruled world. The home building instinct, an instinct as natural as the nest building instinct of a mated bird, will be easily satisfied. That follows from the more equable distribution of land values which the motorcar will bring about and from the ease with which a man may journey from his house to his office or to a distant railway station.

And with that change there will be satisfied the craving for the open air, for trees and flowers, for starlight and moonshine, for outdoor games and the full enjoyment of nature. Only in the heart of the city itself will there remain in subways for trains and motor trucks a reminder of the life we now lead. And even there the spacious public squares and the fine, smooth wide streets, necessitated by many parallel streams of speeding cars, will faintly recall the constricted city passageways of the present.—Waldemar Kaempffert in McClure's Magazine.

Husband's Bravery.

Just after hearing a noise in the house at night don't you hate to talk to your wife and let her notice how short your breath is? It is calculated to make her think that you are not as brave as a lion, when as a matter of fact it proves that you are. When you hear the noise, in imagination you jump from the bed and grapple with it—catching the noise by the throat and choking it until it is black in the face. Well, you are naturally short-winded and the imaginary struggle gets you out of breath. That is all there is to it.—Claude Callan in Fort Worth Star-Telegram.

Ancients Used Few Adjectives.

The plethora of adjectives in modern literature contrasts with the abstinence of the ancients in this respect. A contributor to the Italian review, Minerva, with time to spare, has made a count of substantives and adjectives in the works of Vergil, Dante and Leonardo. In the second book of the "Aeneid," which contains the fall of Troy, there are 1,637 nouns and 589 adjectives. In Dante's "Divina Commedia," out of the 6,215 adjectives which it contains only seventeen are in the superlative. These are facts from which the tyro in literature may well draw a moral.—Christian Science Monitor.

Just a Suggestion.

Before a man is hired to work at certain munitions plants he is required to give a complete account of himself and to answer a series of printed questions on a regular form.

The most important question of all appears at the head of each pedigree form. It is printed in bold faced type and inquires, "Where shall we ship your remains?"

Many a prospective workman gets "cold feet" when this significant inquiry greets his eyes.—New York Sun.

The President's Title.

Washington, the first president, was inaugurated April 30, 1789. The ceremony was delayed several days while congress disputed as to whether the chief magistrate should have such title as "his excellency," "his highness" or the like. It was decided that he should be simply "the president of the United States."

At the Reception.

Said He—They tell me you are an authority on flowers. Said She—Oh, hardly an authority, although I have made a study of them. Said He—Well, what would be the result if a blooming idiot was to mate with a society belle?—Exchange.

The Hen.

The hen is nowhere noticed in the Old Testament. It is mentioned in the New Testament, however, in Matthew xxiii, 37, and Luke xiii, 34. That a bird so common in Palestine should receive such slight notice is considered to be singular.

His Sole Occupation.

Cholly—Will you marry me if I stop smoking cigarettes?

Miss Bright—No, Mr. Sappy; I couldn't think of marrying a man who did nothing.—Boston Transcript.

Nautical Note.

Comforting Her.

Miss Wry—I have a picture in my mind of my future husband. Miss Guy—I bet it will never be developed.

PRACTICAL HEALTH HINT.

How to Avoid Grippe.

Don't put your mouth close to a telephone transmitter.

Avoid overeating, stuffy rooms and undue exposure to inclement weather.

Have a drinking glass, knife, fork, spoon, towels, pillowcase and handkerchief for your very own. Keep these articles by themselves.

Stay away from congested places where there is apt to be poor ventilation and where there are always people with colds.

Keep the feet dry, take plenty of exercise, observe regularity in bedtime hours and do not dress too warmly indoors. It is also well to have the nose and throat examined.
