KENTUCKY.

A correspondent of the National Intelligencer, writing from Louisville, under date of May 15, says:

"You know Gov. Crittenden and Mr. Guthrie head the Union ticket lately elected by at least four-fifths of the entire vote of this State. They are noble and steadfast workers for the Union. Mr Guthrie last evening made a speech here in which he reiterated his counsel for peace, obedience to the laws, and fidelity to the Union and the Constitution. Mr. Crittenden in a recent speech said: "I am for the the Union, now and forever, without if's or ands or conditions of any sort." Mr. C. combats the cry about "Kentucky's imperative duty to arm herself with the view of making common cause with her sister States of the South." He is not for a neutrality subserving secession, but for a neutrality compatible with Kentucky's loyality to the Union. Ex-Gov. Dixon, too, has labored gallantly on the same Union ticket. Wherever he speaks he vows he never will fight with the South to destroy the Government of the Union; that he never will surrender the Stars and Stripes; that he and his Kentucky friends will never suffer the flag of our Union to be stricken down and trailed on the soil of Kentucky. Two other ex-Governors of Kentucky (Mr. Owsley and Mr. Wickliffe) say emphatically "they will be the last men in Kentucky to leave the Union; and, when every other man has done so, they will seize the flag of their country, and claim it for their own" Many other eminent Kentuckians express the same national feeling, and proclaim, with Henry Clay, in 1850, their "paramount allegiance to the whole Union."

How the Campaign ought to be Conducted.—The Norfolk (Va.) Day Book has a plan for the summary termination of the war. We quote:

The South has but to place her forces in such a position as to prevent an advance upon her borders, and at the same time hold the Northern army at Washington at bay, then lay siege to Fortress Monroe, while Bragg attends to Pickens. The capture of these two forts will end the war at once. The privateers, torpedoes and sub-marine batteries will soon be a complete offset to the entire naval power of the North for purposes of coast defence.
