POULTRY

HOW TO TELL WHEN A HEN IS LAYING—OTHER ITEMS OF INTEREST TO OUR RAISERS OF POULTRY

Poultrymen who have fully developed pullets should put them up in good, clean houses, and force them for winter laying. Be sure that you have at least four square feet for each hen or the large breeds and about three feet for hens of the small breeds. When you have them closed in good quarters feed them about as follows:

Mash Formula—100 pounds bran, 100 pounds beef scrap, 100 pounds ground oats, 100 pounds bran, 100 pounds wheat middlings, 10 pounds charcoal, 10 pounds alfalfa meal, 5 pounds salt.

Scratch—100 pounds good wheat, 100 pounds cracked corn.

As a hen stops laying there is a tendency for her to take on fat. This is noticeable in examining the pelvic bones, the two bones which can be felt as points on either side of the vent. When the hen is laying these bones become comparatively thin and flexible. When she is not laying they feel thicker and less flexible, due to the fat which has accumulated there. The spread of distance apart of these pelvic bones is also a valuable indication of whether or not the hen is laying. When laying they are wider apart than when not laying.

Many poultry keepers attempt to justify their careless methods of handling eggs by pointing out that in most markets eggs are bought on the case count or ungraded basis. By this system all eggs, good, bad and indifferent, are purchased at the same price. The result is that the price for all eggs is low because the buyer must protect himself against the losses from low grade eggs. This system offers very little encouragement to the farmer to produce good eggs because he gets no pay for his extra care. Under such conditions pride in his product and a sense of responsibility in the consumer are about the only incentive for trying to produce infertile, clean, fresh, well-graded eggs. Producers who are offering quality eggs for sale can often interest the local dealer in paying a few cents above market quotations by pointing out the superior value of their eggs over the ordinary run. If the local buyer will not make satisfactory adjustment for quality, it is usually possible for the producer to find a satisfactory outlet for his quality eggs. In many localities, hotels, restaurants, soft drink parlors, and dealers in fancy groceries are glad to pay a few cents extra for eggs that are dependable. If a good market cannot be found around home the producer has the opportunity of shipping to commission dealers in the eastern markets. New York always pays a good premium for quality eggs.

Now, while army tents are sold at such reasonable prices, it is a wonder that someone has not purchased a lot of them and started up a poultry plant in tents. It would be a cheap way, but not likely a very satisfactory way, of beginning.

It has been the cause of comment that many of our old and worthy breeds are being neglected and the poultry business is becoming topheavy because the majority of the poultry fanciers seem to be breeding only a few of the more popular varieties. In the face of this fact new breeds and new varieties are constantly asking for admission to the American Standard and it is a question in our minds if these new comers will not be in the same class with many of the others, and after their boom is over and they, too, will be in the neglected class. Years ago the Asiatic class, comprising the Light and Dark Brahmas, Buff and Partridge Cochins and Black Langshans held prominent positions among the list of popular breeds, but they are all cast aside and it is a novelty to see a good class of any of them today in the average show. It cannot be because they have no merit, not because they are not attractive exhibition birds, but there is something that has put them in the background much to the advantage of newer breeds. Perhaps it is the feathered shanks that does not appeal to the average fancier. The Brahmas and the Langshans are large table fowls and average layers for birds of that weight.

Hens from high producers will, in like, produce in high quantity if treated properly. If not they will degenerate into the non-producer. It is time that the poultryman returned to sanity on this egg question. There is value and merit in the subject. There is great importance in establishing the fact that potential egg laying ability is inherited and transmitted as a unit character; and that the breeder should practice trapnesting to isolate that quality or use some other method that will bring like results, and employ the system of line breeding to intensify the invisible hereditary unit of high-geared egg production. It is well to discuss the problem from this educational standpoint, but it is dangerous to promote the subject as a fascinating piece of propaganda.

—The trestle bridge over Walsey Creek, on the tracks of the M. D. & V. R. R., near Queenstown, will be eliminated in the near future. Construction men are engaged in laying huge concrete pipes under the structure sufficiently large to take care of any amount of water it may be necessary to carry it away. As soon as this is completed the actual work of filling in the creek with dirt will be begun. This will afford a greater degree or safety, and do away with a great deal of expense and upkeep.
