PROTECT OUR FORESTS

According to the United States Forest Service, there has been an average of 51,000 forest fires in the United States every year for the past decade. The average area swept by fires each year is 15,000,000 acres of which 11,800,000 acres have been forest land.

This means that during the last decade no less than 118,000,000 acres of woodland has been destroyed by fire. This average annual damage has cost $20,000,000 in addition to the damage done to young trees and buildings located on these lands.

It is said by those in the Forest Service that about 90 per cent. of these fires have been caused by careless persons. Carelessness is another name for lack of thrift.

There is great need, particularly at this time of year, for arousing the public conscience over these matters. The press, the radio, the pulpit and every other medium for the dissemination of information and opinion should be made use of in bringing the public to realize the shame and disgrace of the present situation. Through sheer wanton carelessness and for no gainful reason whatever, we are destroying one of the most priceless possessions that generous Nature has given us.

Eastern Shore Association shows an increase this season of 31% over the same period last year and 51% over 1926.
