Farmers, List Your Repair Needs

It would be hard to find a farmer who at some time or another had not lost valuable time waiting for necessary repair parts. Take this territory and total up the time lost in this way and it will astonish you. And all because repairs are not ordered as early as they should be.

There is no better time than right now—just before the busiest season on the farm—to go over your machines carefully, make a list of repairs you are likely to need and send it to us. With this list in our hands, we can order our stock so as to be prepared t meet every call promptly.

Repair part service is a necessary part of our business. We realize what it means to you in time and money to get what you need at once. Help us to help you by making up your list now and sending it in to us.

Second Sight Was Better

By MAY BEDFORD

(Copyright.)

"IF YOU are going to go to make fun you'd better not go at all," said Maud at luncheon to the two other stenographers from her office.

Margaret agreed with this and nodded her head vigorously, as she and Maud watched the face of the skeptic Joan. "If you laugh or even feel like laughing," explained Margaret, "you'll interfere with the messages. He'll put you out if he knows you are the one."

After the session with the character reader that night opinion was much divided.

"I think anyone could have said as much as he said just by looking at me," said Joan. "That man's a good observer, but that's all. Anyone with a keen eye and a little sense could do as much."

Thereafter Joan tried to prove the truth of her statement, essaying her own hand at character reading. She spent what had hitherto been tiresome minutes in the subway observing and weighing her observations.

Maud objected that since no one knew these people no one could tell whether Joan was really making correct deductions. Thereupon it was decided that Joan should try Mr. Davis, who had just been transferred to the New York office and about whom none of the girls knew anything yet. They had not even heard him speak, but had merely watched him.

Joan felt that the vindication of her stand on the subject of spook character revelation depended on her success or failure—so she used her eyes keenly. Not only did she watch Mr. Davis closely when he was in sight, but she thought about him when he was not. She tried to feel the personality of Mr. Davis so that she would be better able to know it. This continued for two days. The morning of the third day Joan met Margaret and Maud before office hours.

"I have never heard him speak or spoken to him, yet I believe he is from New England, possibly Boston," she said. "He wears a wrist watch—and that sort of man wouldn't wear a wrist watch unless he had got in the habit in the service. He was in the World war—I think in France. Of course, he is a college man—you can tell from his fraternity pin. He's the kind of man who's proud he went to college or he wouldn't wear his fraternity pin to business. That's simple. He isn't married, but he doesn't think of his life as being just what it ought to be until he is. He's probably got a lot of idealistic notions about women. He'd be mighty good to the girl he married, but he'd expect sympathy and devotion in return. He is just a little suspicious about the modern girl. Yet she interests him."

That night Joan remained a little after five to finish some letters. As she stood in the hall waiting for the elevator to take her down to the street, Mr. Davis stepped from a bend in the corridor, where it was quite obvious he had been waiting.

As they both lived up town it was a simple thing to begin the practice of going in the subway together.

One evening several weeks later when Joan and the constant Mr. Davis were jolted along together in the subway, Mr. Davis suddenly looked at Joan with an air of annoyance.

"I know what you are annoyed about," said Joan. "I can't explain now, but tomorrow I'll tell you all about it. It wouldn't do here in the subway, some one might hear us."

"Then I'll get out of the subway with you and see you to your home. I should very much like to have you tell me about it," said Mr. Davis.

"You were annoyed," said Joan, as soon as they were in the open, "because you thought I was staring at that self-satisfied young floorwalker opposite."

"You did seem to be interested—but how do you know he was a floorwalker?"

"We were in the subway late for the office crowd," explained Joan. "Most of these people were store workers. That man wore a cutaway coat. He wasn't the type of man who'd have a cutaway coat unless it was part of his job."

"I guess you're right," agreed Mr. Davis. "But the important thing to me is that you were obviously interested in him."

"You don't think I was trying to flirt do you?" gasped Joan.

"I don't want to think so, I'm going to be frank. When I first came to the office I noticed you, picked you out as different from most girls in offices. I flatter myself I am able usually to size people up on sight. Anyone with a keen eye and ordinary intelligence can do it. From the first you were a contradiction. You seemed always demure, and yet that very first week you—well, you know how you used to look out at me. I wouldn't have dared to wait for you that first evening if it hadn't been for that. It was a challenge. And now, Joan, I have grown more than fond of you. Somehow I feel that you are the kind of girl I would like to marry. But of course if you would rather flirt with every man you see, I—"

Joan did not let Mr. Davis finish his sentence. She explained then and there, with perfect satisfaction to both, the reason for her apparent boldness. And next day she told Maud and Margaret of her engagement to Mr. Davis.

Found Out Just How His Employees Stood

A good story they tell at the American club in London has to do with a crabby old manufacturer in a small town who decided after he had made his money that he should run for a seat in parliment. He called his most faithful foreman in and informed him of the fact.

"See what the sentiment in the factory is," he ordered.

The next day the foreman reported.

"Well, sir," he said, "the sentiment is fifty-fifty."

"What," roared the old man, "fifty-fifty? Do you mean to say that it is as close as that? Do you mean to say my men have no more feeling for me than that?"

"Well, governor, that's what they say, fifty-fifty."

"Fifty-fifty? What do you mean?"

"Well, 50 per cent of them say, 't'ell with him,' and the other 50 per cent say 'out with him.'"—Exchange.

Nature Doesn't Remind Us

It is unfortunate that nature doesn't make us as immediately uncomfortable when we neglect our bodies as does the bank or the merchant when we fail to produce in thirty, sixty, or ninety days. Think what a different world it would be, for instance, if the discomfort following the omission of daily exercise or a daily exposure to the sun, or a daily cold bath, or a daily two-mile walk in thirty minutes, were as acute and compelling and filled with desire as are the sensations that follow the omission of one's accustomed meals for twenty-four hours. There would be no skipping one's duty then. In fact the difficulty would be not to overdo it—even as the difficulty of most persons is to avoid overeating.—Physical Culture Magazine.

Righteous Indignation

"It's a lie!" cried the politician, when confronted with evidence which purported to show he had appropriated funds which did not belong to him. "It's an infernal lie, a wicked prevarication, an insult and slander. I never took the money. I shall not let this charge so base and yet so baseless besmirch my name. I know nothing of what became of the dough. I shall fight to clear my name, and before they get through they will realize they have tackled the wrong party. I didn't take the money, and I shall fight the charge that I did to the last ditch, even if it takes every cent of it."—Exchange.

In Other Words, No!

"Priscilla, dear," asked the visitor, "won't you recite, 'Mary Had a Little Lamb,' for me?"

The small girl looked at him in silence for a moment before she replied:

"Really, I would like to please, but I don't care for that poem. To be frank, it has little, if any, literary merit, and in addition it is not true to life nowadays. Owing to the high and ever-rising prices in the meat trade, I doubt if Mary could afford to buy a whole lamb. At the most, I expect she only had a chop!"—Exchange.

Under the Ban

Music was prohibited during certain hours in the precincts of the college, but one undergraduate found the saxophone more engrossing than his studies.

Next day he received a note from the higher authority:

"Much against my better judgment, and for purposes of discipline only, I am compelled to regard your saxophone playing as music."—Exchange.

Dry spots on bearings and on cylinder walls cause the wear that few oils can prevent—but here's the proof of how this oilier oil clings to metal longer and saves your motor

"STANDARD" MOTOR OIL

"Standard" Greases, Transmission Oil and Gear Compound are made with the same care as "Standard" motor fuels and motor oils.

How much do you spend for gasoline? How much for tires? When did your battery last have water? The "Standard" Motor Record will tell you. Ask your "Standard" Service Station or dealer for a free copy.

STANDARD

Clings to Metal Better

The Purpose:

To test the capacity for various motor oils to cling to metal.

The Test:

A rolled steel plate—1 inch thick and about 2 inches long—suspended by light wire, was dipped in "Standard" Motor Oil and another well-known oil at varying temperatures, namely 100°, 200°, 300°, and 400° F. After draining for one hour at the same temperature, the oil then clinging to the plate was in each case carefully weighed.

The test was then continued with the same two oils, taken from the crank-cases of test cars at the end of 170 miles and 600 miles of use. These drainings were subjected to the same tests as the original samples and under the same temperature conditions.

The Result:

More "Standard" Motor Oil clung to metal under all conditions—as follows:

	at 100° % more	at 200° % more	at 300° % more	at 400° % more
Fresh	107	20	21	43
170 miles	20	31	41	59
600 miles	4	4	36	94

The Meaning:

Because "Standard" Motor Oil clings to metal surfaces longer and better—it affords greater protection of all moving parts, preserves your motor and saves you money.
