Mayonnaise and Medicine

By JANE WALSH

(Copyright.)

WHEN Laurence Montresor completed his hospital apprenticeship and became a full-fledged doctor he located in the town of Yateston.

So one June day there appeared in the corridor of the Arcade a bright and shining sign that said "Dr. Laurence Lidley Montresor, room 201, office hours 8-10 a. m., 1-2 and 7-8 p. m." This sign was posted directly beside that other sign that read "Headquarters for the Laura Belle Mayonnaise, room 204."

Montresor was looking over his shoulders at the sign when he collided with a little young woman hurrying down the stairs. It was Laura Belle Jones herself—sole proprietor of the mayonnaise factory. She was hurrying out to post an important letter and was in special haste as she had left some mayonnaise in the electric mixer. This she explained as the doctor begged her pardon for causing the collision and then offered to post her letter for her.

That was sufficient introduction. Patients were slow in coming and sometimes Doctor Montresor, weary of waiting during office hours, would leave his own door open and then call on Laura Belle.

"Your business is thriving better than mine," said Doctor Montresor one day.

Laura Belle laughed a little.

"Well, I can't say that I'm making a fortune. There are about six stores that take my mayonnaise regularly. But there are as many more that won't handle it.

That afternoon, after Doctor Montresor had made his short rounds, he went to a large and prosperous food store. He left a fairly large order for various food products, mentioned at random. He ended his order with "six jars of Laura Belle mayonnaise." The grocer said they didn't carry that brand, but had something "better."

"Oh, I'm sorry; I really don't want any other sort. I'm settling in town here, and I want to have regular dealings with a good grocer, but I'm stuck on that Laura Belle mayonnaise. No, never mind the rest of the things. I'll get 'em all at the same store."

Then Doctor Montresor went to all the other stores that did not take the Laura Belle mayonnaise. At each he went through virtually the same transactions.

The next afternoon Laura Belle was beaming when he called on her—beaming and very busy. Four of the grocers who had held out had put in big orders.

So well acquainted did the young doctor and the young maker of mayonnaise become in the few weeks following that Doctor Montresor felt it his duty to mention the fact of his engagement.

"I really forgot you didn't know," said the doctor, a little confused. "It has been such a long engagement that all my friends seem never to think of me in any way but as the some-time husband of Kathaleen Mayes."

"Is that her name," said Laura deliberately. And then, "Kathaleen is a pretty name — lots prettier than Laura."

"Oh, I don't know," said the doctor. "You see, she's my uncle's ward. He's anxious to see us married. I suppose we shall be some time, but not until I'm able to support her myself. In the meantime I don't want to accept my uncle's proposition to give me $10,000 so I can marry Kathaleen before I can support her.

"Uncle is coming on with Kathaleen tomorrow. They want to see how I am getting on. If uncle sees how slowly things are going here, he's sure to offer me that money. And he's sure to say that it's my duty to take it, since it isn't fair to Kathaleen to keep her waiting so long. If I could only show them an office full of patients, then there wouldn't be any excuse for speaking of money—and things could just be put off."

"But aren't you impatient? Don't you want to marry her?"

"Not especially," said Laurence Montresor

The next afternoon Mr. Lidley, Doctor Montresor's uncle, arrived with Kathaleen Mayes and insisted on sitting in the young doctor's waiting room to observe his patients.

And when Doctor Montresor and his party arrived that evening there were already four patients waiting in the corridor. Ten or eleven arrived shortly. There were not enough chairs for all of them.

The thing that struck Doctor Montresor with surprise was that five of them were members of Laura Belle's immediate family. The rest were cousins or aunts. The last was Laura Belle. When she went the doctor saw her to the door.

"Good-by, Laura Belle," he said, but nothing more, because Kathaleen and her uncle were sitting there, patiently waiting.

Without further ado Kathaleen explained. "This settles it," she said. "If I had found you here fighting against bad business, and friendless, I was going to stick it out. Then there is this little Laura person. I know she loves you. I'm in love with some one else. I want to be released—and I dare say you do, too."

And that night, after the uncle and his ward had departed by a night train, Doctor Montresor sought Laura Belle out at her home and told her what he had not felt free to tell her before.
