'Last Man of Guam Garrison' Revisits Friends on Island

U. S. Marine Corps Photos

Navy Warrant Officer George R. Tweed, who hid from the Japs for 31 months on Guam, recently revisited that island and met with friends who helped him during that earlier period. Tweed was a radioman first class when Japs invaded on December 10, 1941. He took to the bush.

For 31 months on Guam, Tweed couldn't eat openly as he is doing in the photo at upper right. But he's shown helping himself at the Johnston home during his return visit. In the background are Mrs. Joseph Torres, who helped Tweed while he was hiding from the Japs, and U. S. Marine Private First Class Daniel J. Lawlor of Victor, Iowa.

The "Guam Ghost," as Tweed was known, enjoys a laugh with Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Torres (photo at right). During the Jap rule of Guam, Mr. and Mrs. Torres were flogged for harboring the Navy radioman.
