CHURCH NOTES

RADIANT LIVING

The Emerging Statue

By Rev. C. M. Griffeth
Pastor Calvary M. E. Church
Sudlersville, Md.

Sometime ago there was placed on exhibition a thought provoking piece of statuary. It was a representation of a young man emerging from a rock. With a chisel in one hand and a raised mallet in the other, he was busily engaged in chipping away the rough rock from around his hips, gradually shaping himself out of the rough stone into the form and beauty of an Apollo.

As I thought of this statue it seemed to suggest to me that that is what we as Christians are trying to do each day — to chip away the roughness of our lives and to emerge with the beauty of the Christ, not however with the coldness and lifelessness of marble, but with the warmth and compassion of the living Christ.

This is no doubt the thought which the Apostle had in mind when he wrote the admonition to "work out your own salvation."

And so I see the Christian, every day hard at work in chipping away the roughness of his life, the old habits, the ungodly emotions, the unChristlike thinking, until there emerges into being the beauty and strength and winsomeness of the Christ character.

The Christian therefore is an artist, a sculpturer, who seeks to chip away from himself the ugliness of sin that mars his beauty, to delete from his being those forces of evil emotions that defeat his efforts at welldoing, to eliminate from his thinking those thought habits that destroy his happiness. Thus he keeps chipping away until he emerges out of fears into faith, out of hates into love, out of self into Christ.

THOSE WHO REMAIN

When death visits a home, the first concern is to perform the last service to the loved one in a becoming manner. What ever is done must express all the reverance and affection that is felt at such a time. But in addition to this a further responsibilty rests upon the funeral director. It is his privilege and duty to lessen as far as lies with in his power, the burdens laid upon those who remain. By countless little acts of thoughtfulness he can make the way easier for them.

We consider this part of our work as important as any other. Our highest aim is to have our patrons look upon us as trusted friends, ready and anxious to render sympathetic assistance to those who remain behind.

Oil Industry Enlists Radio Aids

By J. F. Witkowski
Principal, School of Radio, International Correspondence Schools

ONE of the indispensable pillars of our industrial civilization is the petroleum industry. Without the motor fuels and lubricants the industry provides, our ships, our trains, our automobiles and trucks, the machines in our factories would be useless masses of metal—and without the aid of the radio the efficiency of the industry in supplying its essential products would be seriously impaired.

During the course of a single month oil tankers flying the American flag will unload 5,000,000 barrels of gasoline and other petroleum products at our ports. Known as the perpetual motion machines of the ocean because they spend nine-tenths of their time at sea, their efficient use depends upon the skill of the dispatcher in keeping his company's fleet almost constantly on the move. With one dispatcher sometimes responsible for as many as twenty tankers scattered over the globe, only the modern perfection of radio communication enables him to perform his task.

Recently developed ship-to-shore-radio telephone communication between tidewater refineries and the refineries' tugs has also contributed to the smooth operation of the tanker fleet. Installation of these systems has made it possible to cut down to a matter of seconds the hours which formerly might be required to get in touch with a tug after it had left the dock and was needed at some particular point in the port. Tugs can be kept operating in foggy weather which would otherwise make their operation virtually impossible.

In some sections of the country theft from oil companies' pipe lines by tapping is a serious problem. To make the thieves' job more difficult a radio tap detector has now been developed. If there is reason to suspect that an underground section of pipe line has been tapped electrical oscillations are set up throughout the suspected section. A distinctive humming in the earphones of an inspector following the route of the line signals the presence of the most skillfully buried tap.

Launching an 18,500-ton vessel soon to become the newest addition to the American tanker fleet.

Removal of deposits which clog the line is another problem met with in the pipe line transportation of petroleum products. The device commonly used to remove such obstructions is known as a "go-devil." Armed with whirling scrapers and steel brushes, the device is inserted in the line and pushed along by the pressure of the fluid at the rate of two to three miles an hour.

Ground crews carrying two-way radio sets follow the go-devils by their rumbling sound. If the device sticks, bumper go-devils are sent through to push it ahead. If this fails, emergency crews are called by radio to cut open the line, remove the accumulated deposits, and seal the line again. On a recent 300-mile job the line had to be cut open ten times before the job was completed.
