and drawn up in line in a cornfield, protected in front by a creek, and on their right flank, where alone they could be approached by a fence. Capt. Burd after waiting for the infantry two hours, and seeing the enemy were beginning to re-embark a mile below, consulted me, and I gave my opinion in favor of a charge, which he immediately executed in the handsomest style—the fire of the enemy was received, but passed unheeded—the fence thrown down, the line of the enemy in full flight; their men throwing down their arms and surrendering; when by one of those unfortunate accidents which marr the best directed military movements, some one in the rear cried "a retreat," and the dragoons gave way. Captain Burd rallied part of them, and renewed the charge, but the enemy had now leisure to gain another fence, covered by a wood and kept up the hottest fire, separated from the horse only by the fence; and the larger proportion of the squadron not coming up, all the prisoners but two were lost, and two of the dragoons, whose horses were killed, are missing, 6 were wounded; nine horses killed and three wounded; and unfortunately Capt. Burd, who promises to be an ornament to the profession and his country, was wounded by two balls in the head and thrown from his horse. I hope, however, that nothing serious will result from his wound. It was really a brilliant charge till the moment I have described, and every man of the enemy would have been taken but for the act of some miscreant. The infantry came up about an hour afterwards, but did not engage, except with their artillery—and the enemy retired, having marauded but little, a few fowls perhaps their only booty."

BALTIMORE: Monday, Nov. 7.

From the Coffee House Books.

LATEST FROM THE ENEMY.

Authentic accounts received this morning from below, state that the Patuxent was reconnoitred yesterday, no enemy's vessels were or had been there for a long time.

A boat came up this morning from Tangier Straits, the captain reports that on Thursday evening, he saw a ship and some small vessels enter the Potomac.

The British brig Commerce of Poole, from Newfoundland, with fish, captured by the Chasseur of this port, has arrived at ——.

The privateer MAMMOTH, of Baltimore, has arrived at ———, from a very successful cruize, having made 21 prizes, 17 of which she destroyed and manned 4. The Mammoth has brought in a full and valuable cargo of goods.

A most extraordinary idea has lately presented itself in the discussions on the floor of Congress. The United States are charged with being ungenerous, in declaring war against Great Britain whilst she had another war on her hands; that is, that, instead of seeking redress when she had the strongest motives to yield it, we ought to have waited till she could refuse it with less prospect of suffering by the refusal.

But the idea in this case is as absurd as it is novel: for the cause of the war declared by the United States necessarily implied that the enemy was engaged in another war at the same time. The war proceeded from aggressions on our neutral rights, and there could be no such thing as neutral rights to be violated, no such thing as a neutral party to be injured, but in a case where the party committing the injury was at the time at war with some other power.

It has been represented also, that one of the original objects of the war is abandoned by the instructions to make peace without a positive stipulation, for discontinuing the practice of impressment. This view of the subject is evidently unwarranted by the fact. The object, namely, the cessation of impressment, will have been obtained by an event (viz. the peace in Europe) subsequent to the declaration of war; and which event, if it had preceded the declaration of war, would have prevented the declaration It was the practice of impressment, not the claim of a right not in practice, that required the United States to go to war. The British King may insert this claim among his prerogatives, as he used to do among his titles his claim to the Kingdom of France. That alone will never produce a war.

It is true that it would be agreeable to have the point of impressment settled by a positive stipulation against the practice, and, better still, to have a stipulated relinquishment of the right, as shutting out for ever the danger of future quarrels from that cause. It appears indeed, to have been intended to obtain the security of a stipulation against the practice of impressment, even in the event of a peace in Europe, because there was at the time a state of things making it probable that such a stipulation, on the terms held out by the U. States, might be attainable, and a prospect that if a peace should take place in Europe, it would be, like the Treaty of Amiens, rather a truce than a peace. When a change took place, letting loose the whole force of Great Britain against us, and at the same time holding out the prospect of a durable peace in Europe, during which our neutral rights would not come into danger, ordinary prudence suggested a change in the instructions, adapted to so important a change in circumstances. The war became more difficult, and the positive stipulation less important It would be well for those who criticise the relinquishment of the positive stipulation to consider how far they may have contributed to it by the additional difficulties they have thrown into the war, by the part they have taken on and since the occasion which gave to the enemy the vast disposable force sent and coming against us.

But, laying aside all other considerations, the war, declared expressly against certain wrongs and persevered in till they actually ceased, will not be without effect in preventing a future renewal of them. The proof will be remembered that such wrongs have been resisted by an appeal to arms, and it will be anticipated that a like appeal will follow a like cause for it. If the British government had fully believed some years ago that her impressments and blockades, as practised by her, would have produced war, and compared her gains by the former with her loss by the latter, is it not probable that peace with her would have remained to this day?

Take a case in history so pertinent that no no one can mistake the inference from it. The British trade had been much harrassed by Spanish Guarda-Costas, which were in the practice of searching British vessels on the American seas, and carrying them into port for confiscation, as having violated the ordinances of Spain. The Spanish court having refused or declined satisfaction, war was declared in 1739 by the British government on that account. The universal cry in England was, free trade and no search. The war continued until the peace of Aix la Chapelle in 1748, the treaty of which was entirely silent on the subject which had caused the war. In the words of the historian "no mention was made of the right of English ships to navigate the American seas without being subject to search; though the indignation occasioned by the violation of that contested right had solely given rise to the war between G. Britain & Spain."

And yet who will believe that the war did not produce the greater respect afterwards shewn to the rights of the British flag.

Nat. Int.

We understand that Captain Leonard, the officer who surrendered Fort Niagara to the enemy last winter, has been exchanged and is now under arrest.—He will be tried as soon as officers can be spared from field duties for that purpose.—ib.

BRITISH DESERTION.

The Montreal Herald of the 15th October notices the bounty of land offered by congress to British deserters, and scoffs at the idea of this being an allurement——valuing one thousand acres at a cent—no where to be found, and if in existence, so far off that nobody would undertake to look for it—as a contrast, he pictures the British soldier at the end of the war, to be rewarded with 200 acres near at hand, worth 40 dollars an acre. Although there is a great deal of hyperbole, and known falsehood in this representation, it behoves our government to overthrow every argument which might withhold the British soldier from leaving the ranks of the enemy, and to give every stimulus and provocative which would induce to a measure so disastrous to the foe, and so fraught with benefit to ourselves.

In a former view of this subject, we gave it as our opinion, that a sum of money not less than $100 and exemption from all military duty in our army, held out the best invitation. A soldier in the enemy's ranks, who has 50 or 100 dollars due him, will not abandon it without an equivalent, and we are confident that the money expended in this manner, would even be better employed than the same sum given as a bounty for enlistment—besides, if while we enlist one man in our army, we can invite one to desert from the enemy, we are doubling our force as his diminishes, and enlistment would soon become unnecessary.—Dem. Her.

AMERICAN PRIVATEERS.

The same paper ridicules the idea of our ever doing any thing on the ocean. If government only give the necessary encouragement to privateers, and forbids their manning their prizes; giving an equivalent of one 4th or one 6th of the property captured as an indemnification for its being destroyed; as also a bounty for every seaman brought in, and prohibiting their being given up; we should soon see whether we are so contemptible on the ocean as the Montreal Herald would lead us to imagine.

One hundred privateers, fitted upon this principle, would laugh at the whole naval supremacy of England They would blockade the W. India possessions and indeed shut in of England itself. They should none of them, however be less than 200 to 300 tons, mounting 15 to 20 guns, and having 80 to 130 men.

The late cruizes, and the wonderful annoyance which a few vessels have done, must make this obvious to government; and we shall be disappointed if we did not see vigorous and liberal measures immediately adopted, which will teach the enemy his presumption and folly in making laws for the dominions of Neptune; and explain to a surrounding world, the justice of our cause and the arrogance of England

Is now open for the reception of pupils, at No 37, Ann street. The design of the Istitution is to give a complete English and Scientific course of Education to youth intended for Mechanical, Mercantile or Nautical employments; and experience has proved that one half of the time formerly spent in acquiring any degree of Education is more than saved as Byrne thinks one reality worth ten thousand theories, and that parents indulge their sons in removing at pleasure from one institution to another, merely to gratify a boy who has been taught every thing and learned nothing. To prevent an imposition by the teacher as well as the taught, the progress of the pupils will be occasionally inspected by Mr. Crosbie, late master of the Military and Marine Academy Dorset street, and a member of the incorporated society of Literary teachers in the city of Dublin.
