The Bread of Nations.

Bread is frequently mentioned in the Old Testament, and was evidently highly esteemed as that which "strengthened man's heart." The shewbread, twelve loaves of which was one of the sacred offerings, was placed in the outer court of the Jewish sanctuary, to remain there untouched one day and the next to be eaten by the priests only. If the people were disobedient and stiff-necked the Lord threatened to break the staff of their bread. This shows how important this part of their provision was in the estimation of the Jews.

Of all food to which civilized or even the semi-barbarous nations have turned for support none has been so universally in use, and thought so indispensable as this, from whatever made or however rudely manufactured. Many things were used that we should decidedly object to if offered to any of us in place of the wheat, rye or corn bread—that we are so well acquainted with. To this day, in countries where our grains cannot be raised or easily procured, the people find some substitute which they make into bread.

Earth bread is made from a white earth in Upper Dunais, formerly a part of Germany, but now under the rule of Prussia, and the poor of that region to this day use this bread in times of scarcity. The earth is dug from a hill where saltpetre was once manufactured. When laid in the sun and heated it cracks and globules, like meal, exude from it. These are mixed with a little flour, and it is then baked. Probably there is some saltpetre or soda in this earth which gives it lightness. Something similar to it is found in Catalonia and also used for bread. It is affirmed that in cases of extreme need many have lived on this bread for weeks without experiencing any injury.

Fish-bread is still used in Iceland, Lapland, Crim-Tartary and other places far north. The fish is dried, then beaten to fine powder, and sometimes the inner bark of some of the trees of that region is mixed with it, and then wet and made into bread and cakes.

Moss-bread is much used in Iceland, and is considered very nutritive. The lichen or reindeer moss contains a good deal of starch. The moss is gathered in the summer, thoroughly dried and ground into meal, and bread, gruels and pottage are made from it. It is sometimes boiled in milk or whey till it becomes a jelly.

Banana-bread. All classes of people in the West Indies are fond of bananas, and particularly when made into bread. The ripe fruit is rubbed through a sieve and then formed into a loaf and baked in hot ashes or dried in the sun. Before baking it is wrapped in some banana leaves. It is always provided by the people for long voyages.

Plantain bread is made from the fruit of the plantain tree. The fruit is about a foot long, two inches wide, has a thick, tough skin, containing a soft pulpy flesh, quite sweet and soon becomes agreeable to all. The fruit is gathered green, the skin taken off and the pulp roasted on a clear coal fire a short time, then grated and made into loaves and served up as bread, or used dry like grated cheese. The plantain is very largely cultivated in Jamaica, and is a native of Asia. No kind of provision, it is said, could supply the place of plantain bread. The natives think it far preferable to wheaten bread or the prepared bread fruit from the bread tree.

Cassava bread is made from a root called Jatroponiat, found in the Carribbee Island. The juice is deadly poison, and used by the Indians to poison their arrows; but the bread from the pulp of the root after the poison has been extracted is much used by the natives, and also by many others, where the root is raised. We have eaten it at the South, and found it quite palatable. The root is well cleaned and scraped, finely grated, and then put in a sack made loosely of rushes. This is hung from a cross-bar over a tree, or two forked sticks, and a heavy weight put upon the grated pulp, with a vessel beneath the sack to receive the poisonous juice. When the pulp is pressed dry it is like starch, and placed over smoke to dry it becomes harmless. Then it is passed through a sieve, and kept dry till needed. It is now called cassava. When made into bread or cake it is baked by laying it on hot iron plates, or on hot earth. Tapioca is made from the finest part of this root collected into irregular globules or tears, as the natives call them, by straining the whole mass while yet moist.

Sago bread is made from the roots of the sago tree, which grows in the islands of Banda and Amboyna in the Malay archipelago. The sago tree is cut into small pieces, which are bruised and beaten in a mortar, then water is poured over it, and left undisturbed for some hours, while the pithy matter, which is the meal or sago, settles. When this is accomplished, the water is poured off, and the meal dried, then formed into cakes, or fermented and made into bread. Those who have visited these islands, and eaten of the bread as made by the natives, pronounce it almost as good as our wheaten bread. The trunk of a single sago tree will yield 600 pounds of sago, and 430 trees can be planted on one acre of ground, producing 120,500 pounds.

The Hottentots make their bread from another variety of the sago tree. They collect the pith from the wood and tie it up in a calf or sheepskin that has been well dressed, and bury it for several weeks in the ground. This makes the pith tender and mellow, when it is made into cakes or thin loaves of bread, and baked under hot embers. Sometimes this pith is roasted, and then made into a porridge. The pith of this variety of sago tree is that used in commerce—granulated by being passed through a sieve while still moist.

The bread-fruit tree grows in the South Sea Islands. The tree is about the size of a well-grown oak; the leaves are of oblong shape, sometimes a foot and a half long, about as thick as a fig leaf and of the same color, though not the same shape, and veined or marked like it. The fruit is wrinkled something like the truffle and is about as large as a good-sized egg-plant. The skin is thin. There is a core inside about the size of a finger. The part next as bread lies between the skin and the core, is very white and very like new bread in appearance.

To prepare the fruit for use as bread it is roasted whole or cut into pieces. When baked in an oven it becomes soft and is something like a boiled potato, though not as good as a first-rate mealy one.

The Otaheitans have three modes of using the bread fruit. They ripe they eat milk or cocoanut milk to it, and beat it to a paste with a stone pestle. It is then mixed with ripe plantains, or bananas, or mahie. Mahie is a preparation of the ripe fruit kept on hand to make or use as a bread before another crop is gathered. The natives seldom eat a meal without it. Europeans, however, find it as disagreeable as pickled olives usually are when first eaten.

Chestnut-bread is much used in Southern Europe, particularly in Italy and the island of Corsica. It is made from horse chestnuts, seldom, if ever, used as food in this country.

The skins are removed from a peck of horse chestnuts, and the meat bruised to a paste, which is then covered for a short time with water, to destroy the bitter qualities of the nut. Then it is strained through a sieve. A milky liquor is thus separated from the mass, which, after standing a short time, deposits a fine white powder. When dried and ground into flour it is without smell or flavor. This flour is then made into bread without any other article added.

Millet-bread is also much used by the Italian peasantry, and if eaten warm is good, but becomes dry and crumbly when cold. When cooled and then toasted, or baking it is nutritious, but as bread, unless eaten immediately, it is very astringent and unhealthy.

Bean flour is often made into a thick batter with water, and baked in a hot kettle. It is somewhat used in parts of Scotland.

Bagwort is times of great scarcity has been prepared for bread. The root when first dug up is soft, but soon hardens, and can be kept in that state for years without injury if left in a dry, airy place. The root is easily grated and reduced to flour. The bread made from this flour gives a singular account of wood which, prepared in a certain manner, which we have not space to give in detail, makes a palatable and nutritious bread, closely resembling corn bread.—Christian Union.

FOR SALE BY

THE OXFORD GUANO CO., Oxford, Md.

W. H. SETH, Secretary.

The attention of Farmers who desire to secure a good fertilizer at a reasonable price, is respectfully called to the above named brand.

The object of the manufacturers has been to originate a compound of plant foods directly adapted to the soil of the Eastern Shore of Maryland, and to fix the price thereof at the lowest possible figures; cutting off all agents fees of $5 and $6 per ton and adding to the actual cost only a very small profit. We think this fertilizer has as much intrinsic value as most of the high priced manures, and feel confident that farmers who may think proper to use it will say, that in its effects upon the soil, it will equal them.

The analysis, as made by Prof. G. A. Liebig, shows it to contain:—

Ammonia, from	1.25 to 1.55 per cent.
Phosphoric Acid, from	5.60 to 7.00 "
Lime	32.10 "
Carbonic Acid	26.07 "

The lime and carbon, which are essential to plant growth, are obtained from oyster shells ground to powder, instead of being burnt. This combination not only dispenses with the necessity for dirt or sand to hold the chemicals, but is a most valuable assistant to their action.

We are now manufacturing ground lime which we propose to put upon the market at a low price.
