Agricultural.

Does It Pay to Grind Corn with the Cob?

We are frequently asked this question, and upon the strength of several years' experience we can only answer that under some circumstances it does, while under others it would prove unprofitable. The American Farmer states the case so fairly, [illegible] and in accordance with our own views, that we make room for an extract upon the subject: It depends upon the facilities for grinding and the kind of stock to be fed. Sheep grind corn better than cattle, and therefore they utilize the nutriment in whole corn better. The cob contains more actual nutriment than is generally supposed. It shows on analysis 2.6 per cent. of carbo-hydrates, 1.4 per cent. of albuminoids, and the same of fat. It is quite safe to say that cobs have one half the value of hay when fed with food rich in nitrogen, which it is [illegible] lacks; and when the cob is ground fine in burr mill stones there is nothing injurious to animals in it. There is much talk about the danger of feeding cob meat, but there is no foundation for this prejudice. When the cob is ground fine with the corn it must certainly be in a much better condition for feeding than corn in the ear, when cattle swallow a large part of the cob without masticating any more than is necessary for swallowing it. Yet the cob does not pass in anything like the proportion the grain does, and while millions of cattle are fattened every year in the West on ear corn, sensible people will not be alarmed at the danger of feeding well-ground cobs. Where mills are prepared for grinding cobs it will pay to grind in the ear, as, in addition to the nutriment in the cob, it saves shelling, and the cob mixed with the meal separates the particles of meal, so that it goes into the stomach in a more perfect condition, the gastric juice thus penetrates it more perfectly, and the meal is digested better than when eaten alone. The writer fed five work horses upon cob-meal [illegible] for several years, and found the result excellent. We do not wish to convey the idea that corn-cobs of themselves would be worth grinding, but corn in the ear can be ground whole as cheaply as corn can be shelled and ground; and, if the farmer is short of fodder, there can be no doubt that it is wisdom to grind cob and all.

How to Feed Horses.

Some persons do not know how to feed their horses. Possibly we may be one of them. Perhaps this is what we have to say on the subject:

Let each horse have three meals a day consisting of one quart of corn meal and two quarts of wheat bran, mixed with a little wheat chaff, cut hay or corn fodder, and moistened. Occasionally for dinner change, give corn in the ear. Twice or three times a week give a mess of potatoes or other roots, say a half peck, and occasionally a little linseed meal.

When spring work commences and the teams are shedding their coats, give in addition to the regular feed, a quart of good white middlings or ground rye to each horse, three times a day, for about a month, and, in addition, about half as much mixed hay as he would eat.

Fed thus, with fair shelter and good grooming, the teams will keep in good health, be plump and full of vigor, and go through the spring work without any trouble.

We don't mean to say, however, that three quarts of corn meal and oats per day—two parts of the former and one of the latter—mixed with seven pounds of cut hay, and moistened, isn't a first rate diet to run through the year—a little less corn in summer and a little less oats in winter, varying some with the requirements of each horse. But when hard work is to be done, if the horses do not work, they need less food certainly.

And yet we know very well that in places we note from market, where land is dear, feed cheap and the economies need not be closely studied, that uncut hay, corn on the ear and unground oats, as usually fed by farmers, are good enough for any horse.

Volumes might be written on this subject, but this is enough, for the present.

Cultivating Pansies.

For summer blooming plants sow seed in the house in March or April. Cigar boxes are very suitable for seed sowing. Put in a layer of coarse sand for drainage, then one of fine sand, finally the soil sifted and mixed with one third silver sand or finely pulverized leaf mould. Have it moist but not drenched. With a narrow strip of board make tiny furrows about one and a half inches apart, and in these carefully drop the seed one by one an inch distant. Cover slightly and press the soil firmly, then lay a piece of old soft flannel folded once or twice and wrung lightly out of warm water, carefully over the soil, which will keep it damp. Cover with glass, and keep it in a warm place. In a few days see if the covering is dry; if so, damp it again, and watch for the seedlings. When they appear, remove the flannel, but still keep on the glass, not however so close as to exclude all air. Gradually inure them to the sunlight, and as soon as they have made four or five leaves, it is best to transplant every other one, so that they may have room to grow. Great care is needful with tender seedlings to keep them from damping off. If too wet, they will do this, or if kept too shady. Good judgment is essential for success. As the weather becomes mild, expose them at first an hour or two to the out door air, and thus prepare them for early bedding out. Being hardy plants, living out of doors during the winter, with slight protection at the North, they will bloom earlier and better than many other seedlings. A rich moist soil, and somewhat cool and shaded situation, are best adapted for their growth. For winter flowers do the seed the last of August or first of September, in a frame or boxes kept in a shady place.

The Culture of Beauty.

Although nature alone can produce perfect beauty, art may in a great measure supply nature's deficiencies. We see this instanced in the clearness and lustre imparted to even a sallow skin by GLENN'S SULPHUR SOAP. The lady of forty, who uses this incomparably drops at least ten years of her age. Unlike the dangerous cosmetics which obstruct the pores, it is entirely harmless. See that "C. N. Crittenton, Proprietor," is printed on each packet, without which none is genuine. Sold by druggists and fancy goods dealers.
