UNEXPECTED RIVAL.

BY KATE CLAIR.

Brightly glowed the fire in the polished grate, and brilliantly flashed the light from a dozen gas jets, throwing, through the crimson-curtained windows, a rich glow upon the snow-covered pavements without; speaking to the weary hearted toil-worn children of poverty, passing by to cheerless homes, of warmth and comfort and blessing which might never be theirs.

Within that curtained room, where naught seemed wanting of beauty or luxury, a young girl stood behind the drapery, gazing out into the stormy night, and tapping her little foot impatiently on the floor, while an expression of angry discontent shadowed a face perfect in outline and coloring, marring sadly its otherwise exquisite loveliness.

The snow fell thick and fast, and but few pedestrians were abroad; none save those who were compelled by necessity to brave the chilling blast and the blinding storm.

Suddenly, with a gesture of vexation and disappointment, she dashed aside the folds of crimson, and advanced to the fireside, exclaiming:

"It is provoking, intolerably provoking! Here I have been watching for that girl for one hour, and yet she does not come. What does she mean by this delay? I shall be raging, if I am disappointed of my dress this night, of all others."

"Why, surely, Ella, you are not going out in this tempest?" said a noble looking silver-haired man, who entered the room just in time to catch her last word.

"Indeed but I am, Guardy. Dr. Hunter is coming for me to go to Mrs. Erlston's ball, and I would not miss it for the world. I am determined to crown my reign as belle of the season, by bringing him to my feet, if possible, before another day dawns. He is the best match in the city, and I mean to secure him at once. The girls are all crazy about him, and I long to triumph over them."

"You speak confidently," said Mr. Revere, "so I shall expect to be woke up in the small hours of the morning with tidings of your success."

Turn we now to another home, the abode of poverty, where Mary Grey, the young seamstress, is bending wearily over her work, a richly embroidered dress, whose silver lilies of the valley, with richly tinted blue bells, are artistically wrought in graceful patterns on a groundwork of white silk. It is the dress for which the beautiful heiress is waiting—the dress in which she expects to captivate "the best match in the city."

Very lovely is Mary Grey, though no rose tint blooms on the pure white of her complexion—very lovely, though her glorious eyes, shaded by long silken lashes, are dimmed with watching tears. Her fingers fly nimbly over her task, nearly completed, the payment for which is to bring needful supplies to those who for two days have scarcely tasted food—her invalid mother and her little sister Lucy, who is now nestling at her feet, crying with hunger. The work is completed at last, and Mary, drawing the child fondly to her side, says soothingly:

"Hush, darling! hush! Sister is going now to take home the dress and bring you a nice little feast. Twenty-five dollars we'll have for this; won't we be rich my pet?"

Tears filled her eyes, but she brushed them hastily away as a well-known rap was heard, followed by the entrance of a very elegant looking man, who, holding out his hand to Mary, said pleasantly:

"I am earlier than usual, this evening, but I am obliged to escort a fair lady to a ball at ten o'clock, and thought I would look on my patient before making my toilette."

"Ah, doctor, how can I thank you for your kindness?" said Mary, raising her sparkling eyes to his face, but dropping them again instantly as she met the warm gaze of admiration in his, while crimson blushes brightened her fair face into new beauty.

"Mother is worse, I fear, Doctor," said Mary. "She seems quite exhausted this evening."

"Has she had proper nourishment to day?"

"Mamma has not had anything to eat, doctor?" broke in little Lucy; "and sister and I haven't had anything either but dry bread, and we are very hungry; but sister is going to get some money to-night."

"Hush! Lucy," said Mary, while a painful look of embarrassment fell upon her before bright countenance. "Doctor, excuse her; she talks too fast."

An anxious, inquiring gaze rested on her, and in a voice trembling with emotion, Doctor Hunter exclaimed:

"Mary, is it indeed so?"

She bent her head in assent but after a moment of silence, found voice to say, "I shall have money to-night."

Giving but a glance at his patient, whose emaciated face spoke of suffering and want, even in sleep, he left hastily. And Mary, folding her work, and carefully placing at her mother's side the medicine she might need on waking, at the same time charging little Lucy to stay by her in her absence, started out, in the fierce storm, to carry the dress to the heiress, who sat chafing at her delay.

Mary's father had once been rich, but, crushed by adversity, had died and left his family poor, and his widow an invalid.

Dr. Hunter had known them in their days of prosperity, and on his return home from the continent, a month previous to our story, had sought them out and offered his services gratuitously—an offer gratefully accepted. He knew they were poor, but never until Lucy's revelation had he dreamed of the extent of that poverty. The loveliness of Mary had made a deep impression on his heart, and when he left them that night it was with the resolve to shield her in future, under his protecting love, from all life's cares and hardships.

It was, indeed, a fierce storm that Mary was forced to encounter on her way to Mr. Revere's splendid abode, and her progress was necessarily slow.

As, chilled by the stinging blast, and blinded by the snow, she staggered up the steps of the brilliantly lighted mansion and rang the bell, a sleigh dashed to the door, and when it was opened to admit the trembling girl, a gentleman alighted and ran lightly up, passing in, ere it was closed, and saying to the servant, "I will wait for Miss Ella in the drawing-room."

Mary started; she knew the voice of Dr. Hunter, and not wishing to be recognized drew her hood closely around her face.

"Poor girl!" thought the doctor; "what a night for a woman to be abroad!"

He little dreamed who he was pitying.

Directed by the servant, Mary tapped lightly at the opposite room. It was opened by Ella Raymond in a towering rage, her face distorted with passion.

"So you have come at last?" she exclaimed angrily; "two hours behind time. I did think, Mary Gray, you were poor enough to have the virtue of punctuality."

"I am sorry I have disappointed you, Miss Raymond. I have sat up three nights until day-break to complete it in time; but my mother has been ill, and needed my care, which must be my excuse."

Dr. Hunter, in the drawing-room, caught the silvery accents, and—forgive him reader—listened.

"What is your mother's sickness to me? You promised the dress at seven and it is now nine. Your excuse is a poor one."

"Believe me, I regret it, but it was impossible for me to be earlier. You will oblige me, as I am in some haste, if you will now pay me for it, and let me go."

"Pay you indeed? Not I. I'll punish you for your tardiness. I'll teach you how to make promises and break them. Just as many hours as you kept me waiting for my dress, so many days will I keep you out of your money."

"Oh, Miss Raymond, you will not, you cannot be so cruel! My mother is ill, and needs nourishment; my little sister is starving; and I depend on this twenty-five dollars from you to supply their wants. I must have the money!"

"Not from me," said Ella, with a taunting laugh, as she shut the door in her face, and turned into the room to admire the exquisite garment.

Faint from want of food, and crushed by her disappointment, Mary left the abode of wealth, not knowing where to look for help in her trouble. On the pavement still brightened with the rich tint from the crimson curtains, she slipped and fell insensible. Strong arms raised her tenderly, and lifted her into the fur-lined sleigh at the door, and swiftly it sped homeward. Her fit of insensibility, produced by exhaustion and distress was a long one, and when she awoke to consciousness, warmth and light were around her—while at the table, on which was spread a comfortable meal, sat famished little Lucy, eating to her heart's content—her head was pillowed on the breast of Dr. Hunter and his arms enfolded her. Blushingly she sought to withdraw from his embrace, but bending tenderly over her he whispered:

"No darling; lie close to my heart sheltered by my love. No more poverty, no more sorrow, if you will only give me the right to shield you from it, dear one."

Trembling with happiness unspeakable Mary hid her face against his shoulder; but gently turning it toward him, he looked down into the depths of her wonderful eyes, and reading there how fully his love was returned, pressed a fervent kiss upon her lips, and rising, led her to her mother, for her consent to and blessing on their union.

The clock struck ten, and the doctor said with a fond glance at Mary:

"I must leave you now, to keep my appointment with the heiress. She must display my darling's work at the ball to-night or die of vexation."

The expectant fair one waited half an hour for her tardy escort, but no look of anger crossed her beautiful face, no discordant notes marred the harmony of the soft, sweet tones with which she chided Dr. Hunter for his want of punctuality.

It was just one month since the night of Mrs. Erlston's ball. In that time Dr Hunter had bought and furnished an elegant residence on Fifth Avenue. He was weary of single life, he told his friends, and was preparing a cage for the bird of his choice. Invitations were out for a grand house-warming, at which the world should know the selected bride of "the best match in the city."

Every one fixed their eyes on the belle of the season, and were confident that the charming heiress, to whom of late he had been paying marked attention, was the envied one.

"He will certainly propose to-night, Guardy," she said to Mr. Revere, as she stood before the glass arranging her graceful ringlets. "You will not have me on your hands much longer."

"Disappointed once Ella, you may be again. Still, you may wake me, if you come home engaged to Dr. Hunter."

The rooms were crowded, as Ella, surperbly dressed, swept into the splendid hall she expected soon to call her own. Many curious eyes were upon her as she passed with queenly grace to the reception room, and reached the spot where the host stood, with a lady beside him, in bridle attire, "lovely as a poet's dream."

She started turned pale, but recovering her self-possession, advanced; while he, holding out his hand, greeted her as a friend, then leading her gently forward presented her to his bride.

Stupified she gazed in the face of Mary Grey, the despised seamstress; then striving to gasp out congratulations, uttered an hysterical shriek, and fainted away. She had indeed met an unexpected rival, and the shock of seeing the child of poverty elevated to the position her ambitious hopes had led her to believe would be her own, was two much even for pride to conceal.

Mary, ever considerate, came to her side.

"It is the heat," she said to the inquisitive crowd. "Do take her to the conservatory, and leave her with me."

Need I describe the recovery, the shame, the remorse, on the one side; the charity which thinketh no evil, and forgives all things, on the other?

The heiress returned home humbled and saddened, having learnt a lesson that night never to be forgotten.

She did not, as may be imagined, awake her guardian; nor did he wonder when he read the morning papers of the surprise Dr. Hunter had prepared for his friends.

Comfort and happiness soon restored the invalid mother to health, and rounded the form of little Lucy, who now never complains of hunger.

To Mary, life flows on like a fairy dream brighter far by contrast with the past; and we need hardly add, that Dr. Hunter has never ceased to bless the night of storm in which he opened his arms and heart to take into their warm shelter the poor unpaid seamstress, Mary Grey.
