THE MAID OF SCIO.

A GREEK TALE.

A night of beauty was rising over the Archipelago and its lovely islands. Across the waves a broad pathway of moonlight seemed to divide the sea, that sparkled like diamonds beneath its radiance. A single star, high above the mountain peak, glittered and twinkled, "a gem of purest ray," alone and unapproachable in its beauty, in the dark blue sky.

From the gardens beneath the wide terraces came up the mingled odors of the orange, lemon and almond tree; while, wafted to the senses by the light airs that blew from the sea, were the soft scents from the flowers that grow wild upon those beautiful shores.

Beyond, a range of rugged hills were faintly outlined in the moonlight, some of them doubtless covered with blooms to the summits. The sea lay calmly beautiful beneath. An open decked caique was softly rocking on her bosom near the shore.

The scene would be incomplete unless a pair of lovers were in the midst; and lo! upon one of these fragrant terraces stood two forms that might have well served the old Greek painters for the most exquisite models.

Dion Andena and Ida Cassels were these lovers—he, good, handsome and brave; she, as lovely as any Greek maiden since the days of Sappho. Her father was rich, dwelling in all this magnificence of nature, and gathering around him rich treasures of art. Ida was his only child, and her mother was dead. No wonder that he clung to this one treasure with all his heart. He had given her to Dion, only with the agreement that she was not to leave the beautiful abode where she was born and had been reared.

Cassels was one of the most successfull merchants of the Levant, princely in means and mind. Dion was associated with him in this pursuit, and the three were happy and blest in each other.

Strangely enough, in the midst of all this happiness Ida had been, all this day, a prey to distressing apprehensions of evil. She could not define the shape in which it was to appear; but the terrible presentiment of approaching horrors could not be driven away. She had no concealments from Dion, and it was a comfort now to impart her state of mind to him, although she knew he would laugh at her fears.

"What can there be, my love?" he whispered, secure in a happiness and prosperity that had lasted so long that he could not believe any evil lurked behind it. "You must not give way to this morbid state of mind. You are not ill, and your father and myself are in robust health. There is not a cloud in our sky, and we will not call one there by substituting idle presentiments for realities that are far away from us. Look up, sweet Ida, and let this fair moon and brilliant star look only upon smiles."

He ceased, for a tear glittered upon her cheek that he knew was not shed for any foolish or idle whim. She was too good, too sensitive for that. He drew her to his loving heart and talked to her of the splendor of the evening, bade her listen to the chants of the boatmen as the caiques passed and repassed with little pleasure parties near the shore, until she yielded to the enchantment of the hour, and became once more calm and quiet.

Just below, in the moonlight, they could see the towers of a little Greek church, and a procession winding toward it. They who composed it carried lanterns or torches, and the rich wild music of a Greek funeral was borne to their ears by the evening breeze.

Then a sound that shook the surrounding hills, as with thunder, drowned the rich tones of the funeral chant, and every torch fell to the ground. A wild cry arose from the mourners, not of grief for the dead, but of a wild despair for the living.

The lovers heard it and sprang towards the house. Ida's father met them half way and hurried them toward the reservoir, behind which was a concealed recess, unknown to any but the family. Here the merchant had often concealed treasure; but why he was opening the little door now, and why he was pressing Ida toward it they could not understand.

"Speak, father! why is this?" burst from the lips of the agitated girl.

"Hush, my child! the air will hear your words and mine abroad. Ida! Dion! heard you those sounds? They were from the cannon of the Turkish fleet. Already they have landed upon the island, and we must join the band of frightened citizens who are feebly endeavoring to repulse them. Ida must enter here, and I have ordered Adrian to follow with food and wine for them both; until we can come for them. Look Ida! I will close this stone door, but should we not return, and you should not hear any sounds of the Turks, you can lift thus, and release yourselves. One kiss, my darling, and then pray to God for our safety and your deliverence.

Dion uttered no word. He opened his arms and the terrified girl sprang to his bosom, and clung there as if there was no safty for her elsewhere. One long embrace and they were gone, and she was left alone with the little Albanian boy who had served her as a page.

It was a sad night for Scio. Fifty thousand Moslem troops were ravaging the sweetest and loveliest spot beneath the Grecian sky. Helpless old men, women, and children were turned from their beds at midnight; and they who were strong enough to fight were unmanned by the thought of what must happen to these defenceless beings.

Safe in her rocky cavern, yet trembling for her father and lover, Ida strove to keep up a show of courage, for the sake of her little page, who cowered in alarm at every sound of the Turkish cannon that penetrated their retreat.

Terrible indeed was the warfare upon the unprotected inhabitants of Scio. Coming upon them when utterly unprepared for strife, quietly sleeping in their beds, without watch or guard, it was no wonder that the Turkish troops triumphed; and that most of those who did not fall before the scimitar, were carried off as perpetual prisoners, or retained with the "forty hostages" whom their captor's bad faith consigned to a terrible fate, Half these hostages were hung next day. Of the other half were Ida's father and lover, but they were missing.

What dreadful thoughts came to the trembling inmates of the cavern may not be told. All was still—the very stillness making it more dreary.

"Dear lady," said the little page, whose pallid face, seen dimly through the gloom, struck upon Ida as the hue of death, "let me go out and listen. If I do not hear any noise, may I go near the house and see if any one is there?"

Ida reflected that her friends might be there suffering.

"No, Adrian, not alone. We will go together, and may God protect us!"

They left the cavern and looked forth upon the spot where her father's house had stood, and near it the houses of Dion's uncles, all rich and magnificent buildings of white marble, but now blackened by smoke, and only the walls remaining.

Ida dragged herself towards one of the apertures that had once been a beautiful window. The rich stained glass was flying about in fragments. No one was in the solitary apartment, but a scene of desolution met her eye. Her father's beloved pictures half-burned, were hanging drearily upon the walls, the statues defaced and broken, and rich vases and precious ornaments trampled on the stained marble on the floor. She sickened at the sight, and clung to the boy's arm to sustain her from falling to the ground.

But all this was as nothing to her apprehension for her father and Dion. If they were alive and free, they would surely be here to relieve her from the confinement which she had found so dreary.

As she sunk upon the steps of what had been her home, she saw figures approaching. They might be friends—they might be foes. So benumbed had her senses become, that she had no thought of danger to herself, but watched them passively. They came up and gathered around her. They proved to be some returning fugitives; and she wildly asked them of her father.

None of them had seen him since the first hour of the strife. Then he was heroically fighting the foe. These people, having no arms, had contrived to escape, bearing the helpless infants, and assisting the old to a place of comparative safety. They told Ida that, out of the hundred and ten thousand inhabitants of Scio, only one-fifth had escaped being murdered or sold into slavery. Then, indeed, there was no one to care for the poor, bereaved girl. Houseless, friendless, save for the orphan boy at her side, to whom she was now all on earth—what could she do? What could the poor boy do?

One image was ever present to her mind—her father, bowing, perhaps, his venerable form, in abject slavery to the cruel Turks. She saw him continually, in imagination, subjected to the most heartless indignities, a prey to anguish for her, a burden to himself.

"Oh, my father! it was not a weak and idle imagining that saddened me on that terrible night! No. It must have been the shadow of evil that cast itself before my sight. Or, was it mercifully permitted by heaven, to prepare me, in some slight measure, for what has followed?" A single room in the ruined home was capable of being made comfortable. This Ida resolved to inhabit. With Adrian's help, she dragged in two or three of the rich couches that had partially escaped destruction, a marble table, and some porcelain dishes. There was food and wine in the cavern, and she found more in the cellars, that the soldiers had spared or overlooked.

With this provision against hunger, she watched and waited, half hoping to hear something that night to cheer her almost despairing heart. We cannot tell how often that despair deepened around her, nor how desolate were the days in which she sat by the window and looked out upon the dreary scene. Occasionally, one of the returned fugitives would visit her, with presents of fruit or bread, and tell her of some one who had come back after their friends grew hopeless of their coming.

"Do you see that figure, dearest lady?" asked Adrian, one day, when her hope seemed unusually darkened. "It is an old, feeble man," he continued, "and those steps are two steep for him to climb alone. May I go and help him in? He comes to beg food perhaps."

She gave the boy permission, scarcely glancing at the old man, so abstracted had she become, until the boy led him in. Old, bowed, the dark locks changed to a dull gray, the staff quivering in the feeble hand, the hoarse, almost unearthly voice—could that be her stately white browed father? Oh, heaven what a change! It was not until they laid him upon a couch, and and ministered a cordial to his famished lips, and bathed the soiled face and hands, that any semblance of himself could be traced.

But the meeting with his daughter gave him new life; and when he was dressed in some discarded garments that Adrian had found in the cavern, he was refreshed, and became calmer and mor tranquil.

Gradually he was restored to something like his former health and strength. He never told his child what horrors he had expeinced. She only knew that he had, at last, escaped to the mountains, where he had hidden awhile; thence to the sea, where a caique took him to Spain. From Spain he went to Italy and, without stopping to rest or change his worn out garments, he landed on the shores of Greece, half destracted with apprehensions of his daughter's fate, yet hoping that Dion had found his way before him. The uncertainty that hung over the probable misfortunes of Ida's lover distressed him inexpressibly. He saw his daughter wasting like a snow-wreath, and had no power to whisper words of comfort to her ear, when his own heart was forbidden to hope.

Months passed away, when one evening, Ida, who had seemed more cheerful through the day, was seated with her father and Adrian upon the terrace that over looked the sea, watching the boatmen, who, in their picturesque Greek costume, were rowing their boats near the shore, and chanting their evening hymns as they rowed.

"This scene pleases you, Ida," said her father, as he marked a glow upon her cheek, that had not lighted it for a long, long while.

Perhaps it was the reflection of the sunset clouds; or, it might be, that her grief for Dion had given way to renewed cheerfulness. Her eyes were fixed upon a caique that was apparently running in to harbor; and, glancing at Adrian, he perceived that he, also, was gazing at the same object, his breath coming and going quickly, his color raised and his eyes sparkling. The old man seized a small telescope that hung near him, and looked steadily through it for several minutes. He threw a glance of intense satisfaction at Ida, and handed her the telescope.

A cry—not of sorrow—came from her lips. The glass dropped from her fingers to her lap, and her hands were clasped joyfully together; but no word was spoken by either, although both had seen on the open deck a figure that wore no boatman's dress.

Soon the keel grated on the sands, and the figure was seen ascending the slope, Ida glided away like a spirit; and, ere another minute passed she was gathered to the living, beating heart of the beloved Dion!

GOOD OLD TIMES.—His Honor, Judge Joseph A. Chapline, (says the Shepherdstown Register of the 26th ult.,) held a special term of our Circuit Court on Tuesday and Wednesday, (22d and 23d.) The Lawyers' Test Oath having been repealed at the present session of the Legislature, the following gentlemen, upon motion of Judge Thomas Swearingen and Judge J. W. Kennedy, were
