Hens Do Well, Eating Barley Hogs Refuse

Scabby barley, which hogs usually will not eat, may be safely fed to chickens. It gives about the same results in the hen's ration as normal barley, a 2-year experiment at the National Agricultural Research Center of the United States Department of Agriculture shows.

Rations containing 30 and 38 percent of scabby barley were compared in feeding trials with rations having the same quantity of corn or of normal barley. Hens on scabby barley laid just as many eggs and maintained their weight as well as those on the other two diets. The only noticeable difference was that birds fed the ration containing corn ate 10 to 13 percent less feed for each egg laid.

When barley replaces yellow corn in the ration it is best to supply vitamin A by including either alfalfa-leaf meal or cod-liver oil. Barley contains little of this vitamin, if any.

It also is safe to feed scabby barley to cattle and sheep. Although ordinarily hogs will not eat it, they occasionally do. In such cases it sometimes causes vomiting and other undesirable results.

Scab is a fungus disease which affects the quality of barley grain and reduces the yield. It is usually carried over from the previous year on corn stalks and small grain stubble.
