High Feed To Force Culling

Weed Out Poor Cows, Conover Urges

Feed is already high and probably will go higher, so this is a good time to cull the dairy herd, is the advice of John A. Conover, dairy specialist for the University of Maryland extension service. Good producers will pay for their feed, he states, but the poor ones will lose money for their owners.

Mr. Conover warns against trying to save money by half feeding dairy cows. More money will be made, he says, by disposing of the low producers and feeding the good cows to capacity.

Dairy farmers are advised to watch the feed market and buy the feed that will furnish the greatest amount of protein for the least money. This feed can be combined with home grown grains to make a mixture suitable for the herd.

On many farms there is a shortage of hay, according to Mr. Conover. In such cases, he states, a number of weeds can be made into hay and used to feed dry cows and young stock. He mentions also that a temporary silo can be built, using lath fencing and reinforced paper, which will provide storage for additional silage. Legume crops, if ensiled with from 50 to 70 pounds of molasses to the ton, will come out of the silo in splendid condition, and will help lower the feed bill, according to this specialist.

Suggestions for making up rations can be obtaiend from Circular No. 9, which may be had free of cost by writing to the Extension Service at College Park.
