J. EDWARD ADDICKS SCORES ALLEE.

Says He Is A Fool, A Traitor And An Ingrate—"The Best Of Friends Must Part."

J. Edward O'Sullivan Addicks sauntered into the men's cafe at the Bellevue Stratford a few minutes after midnight Tuesday morning. The gasman's face was wretched in smiles as he talked of the latest development in Delaware politics—the breakaway of Allee after years of friendship and championship of Addicks. He tossed a valise and an umbrella in a convenient chair, and sat at a table on the Broad street side of the cafe. In his haste he did not remove either his well-worned gray Alpine hat or his dun-colored raincoat while he devoured his scant luncheon of strained chicken gumbo and coffee.

"When I took Frank Allee up he was a poor jeweler in Dover," Mr. Addicks continued. "I gave him wealth, power and position, and now he pales before the possibility of defeat and exposes himself for the traitor that he is. All the country knows the relations that have existed between Allee and myself. There isn't a man or a woman, and hardly a child in Delaware that doesn't know how poor he was when I first took him up. Everybody knows, too, that today, when J. Frank Allee goes out driving behind the fastest horse in Delaware, it is behind a horse I gave him; that when he votes his stock in the First National Bank of Dover he votes stock that I made him a present of, and that when he walks into his own home and hangs up his hat he hangs it up on a silver inlaid hall piece that I presented to him.

"The course of politics in Delaware during the last 15 years has taught the State to despise the traitor, and when, of its own knowledge, it is able to measure the extent of Allee's treachery, its judgement will be swift and certain. The game has been played out now, and the world knows that J. Frank Allee is the traitor that I refused he could be. In smoking him out and in clearing the political atmosphere in Delaware the newspapers have rendered me the only service I have ever gotten out of them. They have exposed the traitor in the camp, and in doing that they have armed me for the fight, that will be more vigorous from now on than it has ever been in the past. Allee never had the slightest claim to the United States Senatorship. I gave him his seat in the Senate just as I gave him his horses, his bank stock and his silver inlaid hall-piece. He was not qualified for the place, either intellectually or politically, and I gave it to him simply because the place needed a filler. It was under these circumstances that Allee went to Washington. He and his son get $7,000 a year out of his Senatorship and with the other relatives that he has landed in Federal places the Allee family is now drawing about $12,000 per year out of the government treasury. Frank Allee and his relatives need that money, they need it to live on. Allee cannot face the prospect, after his term in the Senate ends, of again becoming the poor Dover jeweler.

"When Allee went to Washington to sit in the Senate chamber, he went there with my tag on him. Every man with whom he comes in contact will look at him and, while he may not say it out loud, he will think: 'There is Allee, the man who has tried to sell out Addicks.' Despised as he will be in Delaware, he will even be more thoroughly despised in the Senate chamber, which is filled with big men, every one of whom knows just how thoroughly 'God Almighty hates a quitter.'

"And, then, there is Preston Lea, the Governor of Delaware. I gave Lea the Governorship just as I gave Allee the Senatorship. The morning of the day when Lea was made the compromtse candidate, I went into his bank and we sat down and had a thorough understanding. I told him that I proposed to make him the Republican candidate for Governor, and he consented to accept the nomination. Now Lea wants to go to the Senate from Delaware, and he has cocked up this scheme with Allee. Allee needs his Senatorship for the sake of the bread and butter he and his relatives must have, and because he wants to hang on to the $12,000 annually that the Allee family is drawing in salaries. He made his deal with Lea to throw me, hold on to his own job and help land Lea as the next Senator from Delaware.

"I am 64 years old, and the victim of a fictitious reputation given me by the newspapers, but I am going to the U. S. Senate from Delaware."
