FRENCH PUBLIC PAPERS.

Letter from the minister of exterior relations to count Philip de Cobentzel, accompanying a memoir in reply to a note of the 25th Fructidor, year 13.

The undersigned has the honor to transmit to his excellency the count de Cobentzel, the annexed memoir, drawn up in consequence of the note from the cabinet of Vienna, which count de Cobentzel addressed to the undersigned the 25th Fructidor.

Since this memoir has been approved by his majesty the emperor of France, the Austrian army has passed the Inn and invaded Bavaria. If the pacific sentiments avowed by his majesty the emperor of Germany and Austria are real, he will perceive that no negociation could have taken place, no new proposition be received, until the Austrian troops shall have repassed the Inn, and reentered their own territories. If the court of Vienna refuses to oblige them to return, it is the intention of his majesty the emperor to compel them by force of arms. The evils which will inevitably result from such a war, will fall wholly upon the House of Austria, and victory will side against the oppressor, in favor of the oppressed.

The undersigned has received from his majesty the emperor and king a positive order to declare, that in no case will his majesty permit Austria to extend herself in Germany, make acquisitions in Bavaria, and put in execution the project of which she has frequently manifested indications, of extending her frontiers even to Leck, and confining the elector of Bavaria, to the left bank of the Inn. This project is too hostile to the interests of the Germanic body, to those of France, to the promises which his majesty the emperor and king has made, and to the engagement which he has taken to preserve the integrity of Bavaria.

After this positive avowal of a determination, which, under all possible circumstances, will constitute an invariable rule of conduct for France, it becomes the duty of the house of Austria to consider whether it is convenient for her to run all the hazards of war, in order to obtain a part of Bavaria, which is her object, but which she cannot reasonably expect to accomplish; for she need not fruitlessly strive to conceal what is already known to all Europe, that such is, in reality, her true and sole view.

The undersigned renews to his excellency the count de Cobentzel the assurance of his high consideration.

(Signed)
CH. MAUR. TALLEYRAND.

Memoir alluded to in the preceding Note.

"Without noticing the allegations with which the note of the cabinet of Vienna, is filled, of the date of 16 Fructidor, (3d September) we will examine the pacific sentiments which this note apparently presents.

"The court of Vienna has made levies and preparations of every kind; and has at this very time permitted a foreign army to enter her territory.

"Her only view, as she assures us, is to compel France and England to conclude peace; but if such is the view of the court of Vienna, why has she forgotten to make known the basis on which this peace may be concluded?

"Shall we take as a basis, the treaties of Luneville or Amiens, or the present state of the two nations, as Austria had desired at the first overtures of the last peace? Or, in short, pretensions drawn from the same source with the allegations at present made against France?

"In attentively perusing the note from the court of Vienna, we think we discover that she wishes to take as a basis for future negociations the treaties of Luneville and Amiens: but has England, who lately refused to establish peace on this very basis, yet adopted them?

The cabinet of Vienna has not made it known, and if it so happens that she does not wish to adopt them, his majesty, the emperor of Germany, who would not assume the character of mediator, if he were not truly such, which essentially consists in inflexible justice and perfect impartiality, has doubtless taken the same measures, in concert with other powers, to compel England to recognize his principle of mediation, as he has taken to constrain France; she, no doubt, has fleets prepared, cruizers fitted out, in short, all the means which are indispensibly necessary to the end proposed.

"The note of the cabinet of Vienna throws no light on any of these points. It is, however, essential to know:

1st. Whether the court of Vienna understands that the treaty of Luneville or Amiens, should be taken as the basis of new negociations, or whether these treaties should be considered as abolished?

"2d. According to the last supposition, on what basis does the court of Vienna understand that the negociations shall be settled?

"3d. Whether England has evinced her adherence to the principles of mediation?

"4th. In case of a refusal on her part, what measures are to adopted by the mediator, and what means are at his disposal to compel her to adhere to them?

"If the court of Vienna has not put these questions to itself, and if it wants time to answer them, that alone should teach her that she has used in her proceedings a precipitation, hostile, not only to all the assurances she has given, but also to the end which she declares herself to have in view; and, we may venturs to say, to what an enlightened policy would dictate to the House of Austria. As to the rest, time will decide whether she has been guided by a just conviction of her own interests, or seduced by blind prejudices."

Extract of a dispatch from the minister of foreign relations to M. Otto, minister plenipotentiary of his majesty the emperor and king, at the court of Munich.

29th Thermidor, year 13.

You may add, that the emperor, desirous of sparing Europe the calamities of a new war, has made such advances as are compatible with the honor of his crown, in order to recall Austria to a sense of her true interests and the observance of an impartial neutrality; and his majesty is of opinion that the elector, influenced by the same motives, should also send a courier extraordinary to Vienna, bearing an order to the electoral minister to make such representations to the court of Vienna, and demand of it what are its views in filling the Tyrol with troops when its neighbors are at peace?

Representations, at once wise and energetic, made at the same time by different cabinets, might arrest Austria, were she influenced only by foreign suggestions, as his majesty still flatters himself with believing; and, on a contrary supposition, they will attach to Austria alone the responsibility of the events which it is their wish to prevent.

NOTE. A similar letter has been written to the ambassador of his majesty at Bern. In consequence of the invitation addressed to them, the Helvetic and Bavarian governments have taken the desired steps.

CH. MAUR. TALLEYRAND.
