CHAPTER XI.—(Continued.)

Valentin leaned over and struck him across the mouth. There was an uproar instantly. Two of them held Govet back. Valentin stood among them, cool and collected.

"I only want to warn you," he said, "that if you make just a little more noise your customers in the restaurant will begin to want to know what is going on under their feet. An inquisitive lot, your clients, sometimes, Felix."

"It isn't necessary to make a noise!" Govet cried hoarsely, wiping his mouth. "There's room for him and for the young 'un where they won't be likely to disturb people extra much."

Signor Vatelli struck the table with his clenched fist. "Enough of this," he said grimly. "We have heard Valentin's story. The jewels are gone, anyhow. The thing is ot get Jim out of the country."

Govet leaned forward once more. "Listen," he intervened. "I'm one that believes in sticking to one's pals when one can. Just now I'm not so sure. Jim's gone daft; he's off his head with fear; he lies there like a mad creature. All the time I'm afraid he'll yell. If he does, it's all up. If he's found here, it's all up with us."

"What can we do?" Signor Vatelli asked.

"The oubilette," Govet muttered. "Why not?"

There was a silence. No one seemed to care to speak.

"Why not?" Govet repeated. "Valentin shouldn't mind. He killed the girl, right enough. It's a better death than hanging. We'd get him off if we could, but we can't. Patrick's on the scent already."

"Before you confirm your amiable intentions," Valentin remarked dryly, "may I be allowed a few words with the young man?"

Govet scowled. "There's no use in it!" he exclaimed. "If he sees you, he'll get shouting or crying. Can't afford the risks."

"Nevertheless," Valentin said firmly, "I think that I must see him."

Govet rose to his feet. "I object!"

"And I insist," Valentin replied.

The others held their peace. Govet rolled up his shirtsleeves. "My neck's worth something to me," he declared. "I'm sick of you smooth-tongued gentry who faint at the sight of a drop of blood. I say that no one shall enter The Rest. I say that and I mean it."

"And I," Valentin assured him, "not only intend to visit The Rest, but I'll tell you why. I intend to see who is there."

Govet snarled across the table. He looked like an animal about to spring.

"You know who's there," he muttered. "It's Jim."

"It may be," Valentin replied. "I desire to reassure myself upon the subject."

Govet placed his hand upon the deal boards. He was in the act of springing over, Valentin turned to the others. "To quarrel among yourselves," he said, turning to Felix, "is to scuttle your own ship. I have no quarrel with Govet, but I intend to se who is in that room. I believe that he is deceiving me, perhaps the rest of you. I do not believe that Jim Macaire is in that room at all."

"Why not?" Felix asked.

"Because he was following me tonight at the Exhibition," Valentin answered calmly. "There's some one else locked up in The Rest. I mean to know who it is and to hear his story."

There was an uneasy murmur. Govet looked from one to the other for support. Felix settled the question. He rose to his feet and moved to the far end of the room. They all followed him. Govet hesitated, and for a moment seemed inclined to crawl away. Finally, however, he followed the others.

CHAPTER XII.

AFRAID!

It was a room within a room, lighted only from a transom, malodorous, furnished only with a tawdry sofa and one or two articles of discarded bedroom furniture. At first it was not possible to see anything except a pair of burning eyes shining through the gloom from the sofa. Then Govet struck a match and lit the candle which he was carrying. He turned a little defiantly toward Valentin.

"You may say," he exclaimed, "that we have combined to deceive you! Have it so, if you will. But for you, that poor creature would have had his neck wrung half a dozen times. We don't want him and he won't leave us. We kick him out and he crawls back. We gave him one last trial. You know yourself what a mess he has made of it. Now he is here because we daren't let him out. That's the truth of it. Look at him. Judge for yourself if we do not do well to keep him where his mouth is sealed."

It was Eugene d'Argminac who lay there. His face was bloodless with fear, his eyes distended. He seemed to have reverted into some previous state of uncivilized, unnerved animaldom. "What do you want?" he cried harshly. "Are they here? Is there danger?"

Govet laughed harshly. "You hear him? Prating always about danger! Look at him, too. Would it be wise, do you think, to let him go free?"

"But I didn't do it," the young man sobbed. "He knows I wouldn't," he added, pointing to Valentin. "I never thought of such a thing. I talked to her on the boat. She promised to call for one moment at my rooms. When we got to Pluman's Row, it was Jim who was waiting there with the Dandy—it was Jim who did it! Oh, it was horrible!"

Valentin turned to Govet. "Come," he said, "D'Argminac is telling the truth. It seems to me that it would be better for Jim to be hiding."

Govet pointed to the sofa. "Jim is no coward," he answered. "He can walk the streets tonight and keep his mouth closed. What do you think would happen if this creature were at large? Oh, I remember him before! He has had his trial; he is no use. Any fool could shake the truth out of him."

Valentin nodded. "I am beginning to understand," he said. "So that is why you are keeping him locked up? Very well, you need do so no longer. I will take charge of him. I will pledge my word that he says nothing."

D'Argminac shrank away. "No!" he cried. "I am not safe anywhere but here! They know that I talked to her all the way over on the steamer; they know that I left Victoria in a taxicab with her. I will not go out. I am afraid!"

"There is danger here, also," Valentin reminded him sternly. "If you value your own skin, Guy, you will come with me."

"I dare not," he faltered. "Let me stay here."

Valentin walked over to the sofa and seated himself by the side of the boy. "Guy," he said, "your sister is terrified to death about you. Can't you pull yourself together and be a man? Never mind what these people say. If you have the courage, I will take you away."

D'Argminac shook his head. "I dare not! I dare not! I should be recognized! They saw me in the taxicab with her. I didn't know—I didn't dream that they would ever think of murdering her."

"Do you mean to say," Valentin asked, "that you deliberately prefer to remain here?"

"I am safe here!" D'Argminac exclaimed. "I don't want to come out. I don't want to see the daylight. I am afraid—oh, I am afraid!"

He buried his head in his hands. They made their way outside.

"Very well," Valentin decided, "keep him here if you will. Perhaps he is safest."

"There is no safety for any one," Govet muttered under his breath, "while that young cub goes unmuzzled."

"Perhaps not," Valentin admitted quietly. "So long as I know that he is there, it is well, but remember, not even to save our estimable friend James Macaire must there be any sham suicide and confession, or anything of that sort. If the slightest attempt is made in that direction, remember that you will have me to deal with."

There was no answer. Govet was silent but sullen; Signor Vatelli seemed ill at ease. They made their way back into the room where they had been assembled.

"I will not detain you any longer," Valentin said. "I came here tonight to see that the boy was safe. I leave him——"

He ceased to speak, and the little company of men ceased, also, to pay any attention. Their faces were all turned to the wall where, in a hidden place, a small speaking tube had been inserted. Some one was whistling softly but persistently. Felix crossed the floor, moved aside a colored engraving, and held the speaking tube to his ear. As he listened, his face showed his emotion. He replaced the tube and came slowly back. His face was strained, and he spoke as one who tells terrible tidings.

"Robert is upstairs," he muttered—"le beau Robert!"

It was as though a bomb had been thrown upon the table before them. Blank terror was reflected from all their faces. Valentin alone was unmoved.

"There is no one I would rather see," he declared.

Govet shivered. "Well," he said, "I don't consider myself a coward, but I am not of your opinion. Robert has too many ugly tricks to make him an agreeable companion. It is only a few weeks since he stabbed a man through the heart in a Montmartre cafe. The police there know all about it, but they daren't arrest him."

"They are only waiting their time," Valentin remarked grimly. "Tell me, what does he do here? What does it mean?"

"It was Janette who telephoned," Felix answered. "He is sitting there in the restaurant, eating and drinking. The man who served him—it was Jules—saw distinctly the gleam of steel in the breast pocket of his coat. He has his knife all ready. Heaven knows, he has used it often enough!"

"Is there any particular reason," Valentin asked, "why his visit to the cafe should be inopportune?"

"None whatever," Felix replied gloomily, "except that without a doubt he is here to claim his share of the jewels."

"His share?" Valentin repeated.

"The information came from him," Felix explained. "They were too well known to make the attempt themselves, but they sent word on to us. Now they have read of the robbery in the papers, and no one will ever be able to convince them that we have not the jewels, or some of them. For my part, I know Robert too well. I shall not go near him, not if I sit here all night."

"Nor I," Govet echoed.

Valentin smiled. "Robert and I are old friends," he said. "I will explain the whole affair to him."

Felix shook his head doubtfully. "Robert has no friends when he is disappointed. If he does not believe you, he will strike. If he does believe you, he will probably strike, too."

"I would suggest," Signor Vatelli said, "that we all avoid him until tomorrow. He will have seen it in print, then, in black and white, that the lady's jewels have been restored to her. He will think us bunglers and fools, but it is possible that he may believe the story."

"We sha'n't get rid of him as easily as that," Govet muttered gloomily. "Valentin here seems to be fond of holding his head in the lion's mouth. I am for letting him tackle Robert at once."

"Under the circumstances," Valentin declared, "I really thing that it is no more than fair that I should take the risk."

They were all agreed. Govet smiled heavily. "A very interesting meeting!" he said. "I should like to witness it—from a safe distance."

DAILY FASHION HINTS

BY MAY MANTON

7765 Tucked Kimono, 34 to 42 bust.

WITH LONG, THREE-QUARTER OR ELBOW SLEEVES, WITH OR WITHOUT COLLAR AND BELTED EMPIRE EFFECT, WITH SLIGHT TRAIN OR IN WALKING LENGTH.

Pretty kimonos and house dresses always appeal to dainty women. Here is a charming kimono that can be belted at the high waist line in Empire effect and become adapted to morning wear or can be left free and used for negligee wear. The kimono consists of front and back portions, but there is a box plait over the seam at the center-back. There are tucks over each shoulder that give becoming fulness. These tucks are stitched to yoke depth and are pressed into position below that point. The right front edge of the waist is shaped and is lapped over the left. There is a pretty collar that can be used or omitted as liked. The sleeves can be made in long, three-quarter or elbow length and the skirt can be cut off in walking length or made with a slight train. All the pretty flowered cotton crepes and materials of the kind are excellent.

For the medium size the kimono will require 9½ yards of material 27, 8 yards 36, or 6¼ yards 44, with ½ yard 21 inches wide for the collar and cuffs.

The pattern No. 7765 is cut in sizes 34 to 42 inches bust measure. It will be mailed to any address by the Pattern Department of this paper, on receipt of 10 cents.

THE PERENNIAL KIMONO.

Despite the pronounced vogue of Chinese modes in formal garb, the Japanese Kimono remains the intimate friend of the woman who has a collection of dainty lounging robes. For those cold mornings when the wind howls outside and the furnace is in sulky mood there are comforting robes of quilted Japanese silk, daintily hand worked with light and dark floss. For milder weather there are adorable kimonos of flowered satin with borders of satin or Japanese silk, and some of these have the shirrings at the elevated waist line which slightly suggest a blending of the Empire with the oriental style. Still more fascinating are the cotton and silk crepes in white, sprinkled over with pink cherry blossoms and in blue or rose printed with graceful sprays of white wisteria. To wear the kimono there should be a clinging loose slip of satin in a solid tone matching either the grounding or the figuring of the robe.
