The two next items of Corn and pork being the amount of provisions usually given by the deceased to his negroes, & in their possession, the appraisers were at some loss to determine whether to include them in this Inventory but deemed it adviseable to state the items with the facts within their knowledge in relation to them, that the Court might decide either to retain or reject them the Corn was delivered to the negroes for their annual subsistance. With respect to the pork, the hogs were chiefly bought by the negroes from their own money, acquired by the sale of potatoes & poultry with the approbation of the deceased and to possess the stock of Corn in part & in part from any allowance made them a regular ration by the deceased & in some instances, when the supply obtained by the people failed, it was the habit with the deceased to furnish them.
