"How did I Behave Last Night?"—"How do you feel this morning, sir? uncommon pleasant you were last night, to be sure." Here Thomas's nocturnal reminiscences became too much for him, and he accordingly forgot his sulkiness, took the privilege of an old servant, and went off into an uncontrollable fit of laughter. "Hold your tongue, sir, and answer my questions," said Raffleton. "I am very well, of course; nothing to make me otherwise; drank very little; only a little excited by the company and the lights, and all that sort of thing. How—how did I go to bed, Thomas?" "You didn't go at all, sir; we carried you." "What do you mean by me, sir?" said Raffleton; "Couldn't you do it yourself?" "No, sir; too heavy for that. Me and the family, sir. Family got up on purpose. Mr. Walrus, Mrs. Walrus, and all the little Walruses, and the shop-boy, there they were, all of them—" "Witnesses of my disgrace," interrupted Raffleton. "Henceforth I am humiliated in the eyes of Mr. Walrus, the eyes of the Master Walrus, and the shop-boy's eyes besides. I—I hope I didn't begin to make a fool of myself before them, Thomas?" "Make a fool of yourself sir! Oh no; you was a ready-made one about two hours before that, if you'll excuse my saying so, sir," replied Thomas. "No; you didn't do any thing very much out of the way then, I think. You made all the Master Walruses drink your health with three times three, to be sure, and I had to give them the 'hips;' and then you tried to make Mrs. Walrus smoke a cigar; and then you played at going mad, and bit the eldest Master Walrus in the arm and a hole in the sofa cushion; and, after that, you wanted to sit up and play twohanded whist with the shop-boy, and then Mr. Walrus interfered." "Yes," said Raffleton, "yes; go on. I—I didn't insult Mr. W. by chance, did I?" "Not by no manner of means, sir. Quite the contrary. You kissed." "The devil!" shouted Raffleton, jumping slap out of bed with horror at the very idea. "Kissed him! Good heavens! I owe him three weeks' rent." "Yes, you kissed him," persisted Thomas. "And then you said he was a love, and he would be a hangel, if it wasn't for his whiskers. And, after that, you got quite helpless; and then we undressed you, and put you to bed. Oh, dear! uncommon pleasant you were, sir, really."—Vincent Eden—Bentley's Miscellany.

KENDALL COURSE—May 15.

Purse $1000, 4 mile heats—entries as follow:

David McDaniel, entered b m. Vashti, 4 years old.

Williamson F. Towns, entered b. h. Steel, 4 years old.

Edward J. Wilson, entered b. c. Portsmouth 4 years old.

This was the best race that has ever been run on this course. An immense crowd of anxious spectators collected to witness it.—Portsmouth was the favorite before starting, and bets were freely offered on him against the field, and were taken to the amount of some thousands.

The horses appeared upon the course at half past 5, kept in fine condition—and at the time, they started for nothing, brought near the hour of 6 starting, (1 o'clock.) The trumpeter blew his best blast, and the rampant animals were led to the starting post and let go, at the tap of the drum.

Portsmouth took the lead, and kept it, Steele hanging upon his flank nearly the whole way; and Vashti several lengths behind; on the last quarter, Portsmouth parted company with Steele, and came out ahead in full style; Vashti just saving her distance.

Time of running 1st heat, 7 m 52 s.

Steele appeared to be lame, and done over; and as little or no attention was directed to the paid Vashti, it was concluded on all sides that there would be no further contest—that there was nothing in the field that could put Portsmouth up in the second heat.

In 30 minutes, the time for starting came again, and all the horses appeared ready for the second heat. Steele, as if by a miracle, lost his lameness, and they all went off in fine spirits. Porstmouth had the lead, and kept it for nearly 3 miles in company with Steele, Vashti trailing in the rear. About the middle of the 4th mile, she made a gradual gain, and at the last quarter past both horses, Portsmouth falling immediately in her rear, and Steele being some lengths behind; she came out in fairy style winning the 2d heat clear of them both.

Time of running 2d heat, 7m. 46 s.

"Here a change came o'er the spirit of the dream."

Portsmouth had fallen below par—Steele had done much better in this heat than was expected—and Vashti deceived some of the "knowing ones," and all the crowd.

3d heat—Portsmouth withdrawn—Steele and Vasti started fair—Vashti took the lead and kept it, with Steele at her side for 2 miles and just behind her for all the third mile; but never passed her, although he proved himself true as his name—it was impossible—she left him at the last quarter, to look after her in vain, and won the 3d heat in 8 minutes 12 seconds.

And now the hurly burly's done,
And the battle's lost and won;
Some were made and some undone.

The subscriber has no desire to get customers by any appeals that he could possibly make, but requests the citizens to reflect one moment upon the impropriety and injustice of neglecting the mechanics of their own towns and supporting those of foreign places—Such a course will, in its operation beggar the mechanics of any town, no matter how industrious and careful they may be—and not the mechanics only; but the merchants who deal in those foreign articles also—Such is the undeniable tendency of such a course of business.
