A FRIEND TO THE WORKING MAN

Five years ago I was so troubled with kidney trouble and inflammation of the bladder that I had to cease working my farm. Life looked dark to me until I heard of Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root through a cured friend. I tried a bottle and began to feel better at once. After using five or six bottles I felt fine and have continued to work as I had before my affliction.

I want to state that Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root is a kidney medicine that will cure and I owe my good work during the past five or six years to it.

Yours very truly,
C. W. MORRIS,
Prescott, Ark.

Subscribed and sworn to before me, this 27th day of March, 1912.
O. B. GORDON,
Notary Public.

This is to certify that Mr. C. W. Morris has bought Swamp-Root at this store in the past.

RAISING TURKEYS

Miss Wilkins, of Quaker Neck, One of Kent's Successful Poultry Raisers, Explains Turkey Raising on a Chester River Farm.

"Here in Maryland, where the farms are several hundred acres in extent, affording splendid range for turkeys, the farmer's wife or daughter who neglects to keep a flock is wasting a golden opportunity. I know of nothing that yields as good returns for the time and money invested. In order to prove that statement, I shall give an account of my last year's experience in that line, which I think may be duplicated by any woman who will follow the plan outlined.

"In the first place, too much stress cannot be laid upon the importance of good, healthy breeding stock. I prefer the bronze variety; they are the largest, and any one raising turkeys for market should aim to grow large-framed, heavy birds. My preference is for hens, two, three or four years old, mated with a vigorous, well-developed yearling tom. I keep 12 hens with one tom and last year raised 140 turkeys, which were sold before Christmas; for it is part of my policy to sell early in the season.

"After Christmas I feed very lightly, as I do not want the breeding stock over fat. Turkeys in our locality begin to lay about the middle of March, so early in that month I spray the laying house, then arrange the nests, and drive the hens into the house each morning at eight, releasing them at three in the afternoon. There is always within the house an abundance of fresh water, bran, oyster shell, grit and old plaster. By penning the hens during the laying season I am able to gather the eggs with a minimum of trouble, and the oyster shell and plaster continually within their reach makes a soft-shell egg an unknown quantity.

"As soon as the hens become broody I set them. I know that a number of successful breeders advocate breaking them up in order to secure more eggs, but experience has taught me that this is not a wise plan. The second litter of eggs does not hatch well, and the earlier in the season the poults are hatched the better, since the best market is at Thanksgiving, and turkeys hatched late in the spring never attain the heavy weight so much desired by the grower.

"As the hens become broody I set them singly in a light portable coop in a nest which has been thoroughly dusted with some good insect powder. The hens are dusted at the same time and several times during the setting. Each morning I force the hen to leave her nest for the sake of exercise, watering and feeding her at this time.

"My twelve hens last year hatched 198 turkeys. After the poults were thoroughly dry they and the mother were well dusted with insect powder and the mother fed liberally. Then they were transferred to the orchard, where the same coop in which they were hatched was used as a shelter for the first six weeks.

"I do not feed the poults until they are twenty-four hours old. After this time they are fed four times daily for three weeks. The feed I use is a mash made from bran, rolled oats, middlings and animal meal, equal quantities by weight, with a little charcoal and grit added to each feed.

"I believe egg to be very necessary for the young poults' first feed, but I do not hard boil them, as so many people advocate. I make each day a baked custard, allowing 4 eggs and 1 quart of milk to 50 turkeys. I mix some of the mash with custard and the youngsters soon learn to devour it greedily. At the end of one week I discontinue the custard and mix the mash with water into a crumbly state. From the day the little turkeys are hatched, or rather from the day after they are hatched, until they are ready to market, I feed the mash daily, adding wheat when the turkeys are a month old, and later in the season some cracked corn. There is something about the mash feed (I think it is the animal meal) which turkeys seem to like especially.

"For five or six weeks I do not allow the hens to leave the orchard, but as soon as the wheat is cut down in the fields I give the flock their freedom, and they range over the farm gathering their living as they go, though I still continue to feed the mash when they come home in the evening. Right here I want to say that I never have to roam the field at sundown looking for my turkeys; they have come home every evening for the past three years. I attribute this to their peculiar fondness for the mash. Before I commenced using it I had walked many weary miles in search of turkeys, which an anxious fancy had pictured as possible victims of foxes or thieves.

"About the first of October I begin to feed whole corn. This I use very sparingly at first, but by November I give the flock twice daily all they will eat, morning and evening, with mash at noon.

"Last year (it was the most successful year in my experience, though the year before I raised 131) I had at Thanksgiving 140 well developed healthy turkeys, any of the hens weighing, when dressed, 14 and 16 pounds, and the young toms from 20 to 25 pounds, and not a single scrub in the flock.

"I kept an accurate account of expenses, and found that the feed bill for the season was $82.53. The turkeys were sold to a grocerman in Philadelphia, who paid 27 cents per pound, 3 cents above the quotation. After deducting express charges and expense of picking and packing the turkeys, I closed my books at Christmas very well pleased with the profit from my work."—Exchange.

WILKINSON IS CAPTAIN.

Paul Wilkinson, tackel on the John's Hopkins team, and all Maryland tackle last season, when he played for Washington College, was elected captain of next year's Black and Blue eleven last week after the St. John's game, when the varsity men had a meeting in the clubhouse. He will succeed Raymond Leibensperger, also tackle, who was captain this season.

Hopkins seems likely to suffer only slightly from losses by graduation. Practically the whole eleven will be back. Leibensperger, who is in his senior year, will return for graduate work and will be eligible.

It is expected that the football advisers and athletic association will make a strenuous effort to secure for next season the services of John M. Cates, who has been chief coach since the middle of the season. The form the team showed yesterday was largely due to his tutelage, and, working with the same material next season, there seems to be no reason why he should not turn out an eleven a great deal classier than any Hopkins has ever had, and which will be able to meet bigger teams on equal terms.

Captain Wilkinson spent several days this week with Chestertown friends. Mr. Wilkinson graduated at Washington College in Class of 1913 and made a most enviable record here both in his studies and in athletics. In fact he was a model college student.
