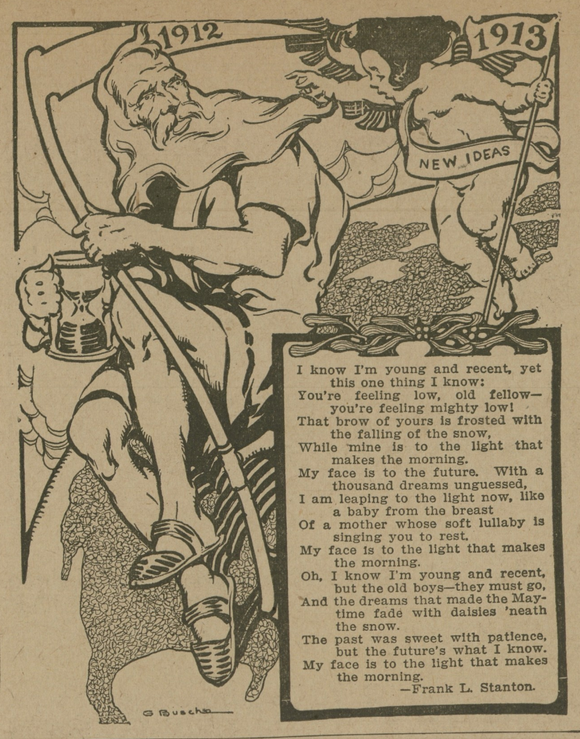
The New Year to the Old.



I know I'm young and recent, yet
this one thing I know:
You're feeling low, old fellow—
you're feeling mighty low!
That brow of yours is frosted with
the falling of the snow,
While mine is to the light that makes the morning.
My face is to the future. With a thousand dreams unguessed,
I am leaping to the light now, like
a baby from the breast
Of a mother whose soft lullaby is singing you to rest.
My face is to the light that makes
the morning.
Oh, I know I'm young and recent,
but the old boys—they must go,
And the dreams that made the Maytime fade with daisies 'neath
the snow.
The past was sweet with patience,
but the future's what I know.
My face is to the light that makes
the morning.
—Frank L. Stanton.

A FATEFUL NEW YEAR'S DAY

NEW YEAR'S DAY is the anniversary of an event which marked the happy conclusion of one of the most fateful acts in the shifting, momentous drama of the American rebellion.

On this date just fifty-one years ago the curtain of night fell on the peaceful finale to the famous diplomatic complication known as the Trent affair, which came dangerously near involving Uncle Sam in a discussion with John Bull at bayonet's length.

In 1861 James M. Mason of Virginia and John Slidell of Louisiana, who had left the United States senate to cast their fortunes with the Confederacy, were appointed commissioners to solicit the aid of Great Britain and France in behalf of the south.

On a dismal, rainy night in October they escaped from Charleston on a blockade runner. They left Havana for England on the British mail steamer Trent. Captain Charles Wilkes of the United States man-of-war San Jacinto, returning from an unsuccessful chase of the privateer Sumter, learned these facts, intercepted the Trent, took off the two commissioners and their secretaries and landed them as prisoners of war at Fort Warren, in Boston harbor.

Of course John Bull went into an indignant, howling rage. He demanded the release of the prisoners and an apology. To show that he meant business he sent troops to Canada and began preparations for war. In addition to this formal demand, he sent a little personal note to his minister at Washington directing him to allow the United States just seven days to comply.

John Bull's ultimatum reached Washington on Thursday, Dec. 19.

Friday and Saturday passed without action. Sunday was distinctly quieter about the big building devoted to affairs of state.

Seizing this period of quiet and freedom from interruption, Secretary Seward called his confidential assistants about him and set himself to the task of formulating a reply to Great Britain. Mr. Seward's companions that day were his son, Frederick, then assistant secretary of state; E. D. Webster and a clerk.

Late in the afternoon, just as Mr. Seward was concluding his paper, President Lincoln came into the office, accompanied by John Hay.

After the usual greetings the president referred to the Trent affair, and the secretary of state explained what he had been doing. Lincoln expressed a desire to know the contents of the proposed reply, and young Webster was directed to read it to him. The president listened attentively and at the conclusion of the reading said:

"Read it again, please, pausing a moment at the end of every second or third sentence."

As the second reading progressed the president's face relaxed and plainly indicated a feeling of relief. As the secretary neared the end Lincoln drew a document from an inside pocket, quietly sauntered to the fireplace and threw it into the flames without a word of comment or explanation. The president then notified Seward of a cabinet meeting and asked him to bring a copy of the dispatch just read.

Seward's paper, considered one of the ablest and most important in American statecraft, maintained that the Confederate commissioners and their papers were contraband of war and that Wilkes was right in capturing them, but admitted that he should have taken the Trent into port as a prize for adjudication.

As he had failed to do this and by removing Mason and Slidell had constituted himself a judge in the matter, to approve his action would be to sanction the "right of search," which had always been denied by the United States.

Therefore the commissioners would be cheerfully delivered to Great Britain and that power would be forever barred from reasserting the right of search. This dispatch was discussed at cabinet meetings on Wednesday (Christmas) and Thursday, and after much opposition was heartily indorsed.

Years afterward, when John Hay was secretary of the legation at Paris and Colonel Webster was consul at Bradford, England, they met in the gay French capital, and of course they fell into a reminiscent chat.

Webster asked about the paper which Lincoln had so unostentatiously destroyed on that memorable Sunday in Washington. Hay explained that it was a dispatch Lincoln had prepared in answer to Great Britain's demand and that it was directly opposed to the propositions of Seward's dispatch.

An experimental draft of this document in his own handwriting was found by Hay among Lincoln's papers after his death. Its chief proposal was to arbitrate the matters at issue or in the alternative to carefully discuss the questions involved and formulate a rule binding upon both nations for similar cases in the future.

Lincoln's dispatch was never submitted to his cabinet. At the instant of drawing the copy from his pocket that Sunday afternoon he accepted Seward's proposition without reserve, sunk self and pride without hesitation and changed the impending course of American history.—Boston Globe.

The Old and the New.

Tomorrow never comes, they say,
And yet a year is as a day,
As we shall know tomorrow.
Tonight the old year goes to rest,
His thin hands folded on his breast,
His withered lips together pressed,
And with him goes his sorrow.

Tonight, ere gray the morning grows,
An infant, still in swaddling clothes,
Will come to earth to greet us.
The bells will clamor at the gate,
Will shout aloud: "You're late! You're late!"
Within his hands he holds our fate,
Yet, laughing, comes to meet us.

An old year goes; a new year comes.
The sound of bells and muffled drums
Are ever close together.
The borderland 'twixt life and death
Is but a step across the heath.
One spans it in a single breath
Be dark or bright the weather.

Tonight the old year folds his wings,
Lies down to sleep among the kings
That wait across the river.
To nineteen twelve we say "Goodby!"
To nineteen thirteen, drawing nigh,
For mercy we may vainly cry—
And time goes on forever.
