The Bubble Man

By VICTOR REDCLIFFE

(Copyright, 1919, by the Western Newspaper Union.)

A little child of tender years seated in the lap of a lovely young lady at the window of an office across the court from that occupied by Dale Warren, professional promoter, was being amused by blowing bubbles. She prattled and crowed and laughed as her companion blew the rainbow-hued globes away from her dainty lips, and the fair picture of innocence and beauty would have entranced Warren, had not his mind been oppressed with serious business troubles.

He sat so vaguely taking in the court ensemble that it was only when a bubble from below gracefully ascended, and, caught by an awkward current of air, shot through the window and broke directly across his lips, that he awakened to the pretty picture. Some swift conception of sentiment caused him to glance at the source of the bubble. The lovely lips of the fair-faced young lady had blown the airy sphere. It had met his own, gentle as a kiss. She flushed and drew back, while the child in her lap uttered a shriek of delight as Warren's eyes snapped from the concussion of the ball of air and the filmy shower of dampness.

"Blowing bubbles!" he muttered, almost irritably. "That's me! And the last one has burst and I'm broke!"

Bubbles! bubbles! There was the speculative rainbow fancy of a great system for extracting gold from sea water, of revolutionizing the tanning industry by using the extract of a root common in Idaho; of a substitute for rubber that would cheapen tubes and tires to a mere fraction of cost, and last, but not least, a liquid, which, applied to half-grown melons, squashes and pumpkins would insure quadruple size by the time they were ripe!

He came back to normal poise as some one entered the office. Looking up, he greeted Boyd Dalzell, a broker whom he knew well. The latter unceremoniously dropped into a chair directly at the side of Warren.

"I've come on business," announced Dalzell, "real business. See here, old man, I need you, but no wild goose hunt for the fortune that never materializes. I'll give you $1,000 to come and talk with a man I've financed, and a good fee on top of that, if you find a customer for a new device he has patented."

"What is it?" inquired Warren, and almost indifferently, for prospective millions only were his lure.

"It's a bubble," replied Dalzell, and Warren stared at him suspiciously. "That is, a bubble idea. He's a wise old fellow named Saul Hardy. He's got the idea that he can make a scale with a bubble for an indicator—that old spirit level idea, see!"

"Can he?"

"Not very practical for average use. I have demonstrated that, for the bubble is affected by atmospheric influences; but his experiments have been interesting. I'd like to get back the money I have sunk. You see if you can't work something out of the scheme, won't you? Hardy has an office in the next building. It's only a step. Come on," and three minutes later Warren was ushered into a suite, and a glance into an inner room showed the girl and the child of the bubble episode. The young lady flushed as she noticed him. Warren was introduced to her father, there was an hour of conference, and Warren left the office with another glance at the charming Eunice Hardy and her little sister, Florence, and somehow augured luck from the unique incidents of the hour. Ten days later, after an absence from the city, he returned to report to Dalzell.

"Well," he said, "I have an offer on your bubble scale. I've found a liquid that will maintain an equable air bubble, and I've got a big offer for the device from a great coal mine in Pennsylvania. They can use such a scale, weighing loaded cars on the fly, and where the deviation of a few hundred pounds means little in the handling of tons. You see, the eight seconds a car is crossing the scale the bubble vibration ceases and the bubble chronicles a fairly accurate weight. What do you say to $50,000?"

"I say $25,000 for the inventor and the balance fifty-fifty for you and me," responded Dalzell briskly. "Warren, if I had your ability I'd drop chasing bubbles and graduate into a fair and square broker. Come over to Hardy's office with me. The old fellow will be wild with delight."

But Mr. Hardy was absent, and Dalzell went to look for him and left Warren for Eunice to entertain while he chased down the old inventor. Thereby those two became better acquainted, and two evenings later, when Warren called at the Hardy home, little Florence referred to "the kissing bubble," and Eunice flushed divinely, and Warren looked ardent and longing, and one afternoon somewhat later all three engaged in Florence's favorite amusement, and in a bubble she blew serenely floating in the golden sunlight the reflection of two faces, discovered suspiciously close together, caused her to cry out mischievously:

"Oh, Mr. Warren; I saw you and Eunice, and I'm going to tell papa when he comes home!"

"We are going to do that ourselves, little dear!" replied Warren, and he kissed Eunice again.
