CHESTERTOWN - NOV. 10, 1888.

Trade Apprenticeship for Boys.

The basis for criticism of the conditions of modern life is found in the unwillingness of young men to learn trades. Some element of social degradation seems to be found in the use of the hands; pure brain work is the coveted goal of the many.

It is pleasing to know that this prejudice meets with enlightened opposition. For generations past the sons of German emperors have learned some mechanical trade. In the library of the late Emperor William at Potsdam, visitors are shown a chair made by him when a youth, for his father.

The sons of John Bright, the famous English parliamentarian, set a good example to the rising generation. Their training is thus set forth by the Christian at Work:

"Philip Bright, desiring to become a first-class machinist, served a regular course in Petrie's iron foundry, to which he carried his breakfast-can like other plain workmen, and in which he put himself on a par with other honest hands, acting as naturally as if he were one of them himself. His brothers—Leathem, now a member of Parliament, and John Albert—were put through the drills of the mills on the principle that they too must undergo their share of work like other people. Such an example of common sense and democractic equality is in the highest degree commendable. The great problem of the future will be to unite education and manual labor. Many persons seem to imagine that they are forever inconsistent and antagonistic, and that, therefore, the public schools are training young men to live by their wits rather than by useful and productive trades. Whether the head and the hand can be cultivated at the same time, and in a happy proportion, remains to be seen. John Bright's sons would by their example indicate that they can, but they are capitalists as well as laborers."

Another instance within the experience of the writer will serve to still further point the moral. Over twenty years ago, very early one morning, he met a boy of 17 or 18 years of age hurrying through the street, dinner pail in hand, accoutered as a workman. He was recognized as the son of an acquaintance. Curious to know what brought him out in such guise at so early an hour, the writer stopped him, and inquired whither he was bound. The boy assumed a look of manly pride as he announced that he was going to work at the Morgan Iron Works as a regular apprentice. The foreman, he added, was very exacting with the apprentices and requires them to begin their work on time with the journeymen. The father, who had sent the young man to take his place among the three or four hundred apprentices employed at the famous works, acted with wisdom as was proved by the course of events. He is now connected with one of the most influential and successful daily papers of the country. The son to-day is in full charge of the mechanical department of the business, and is qualified by his training at the Morgan works not only to take charge of the complicated machinery of the modern press room, but also to pass an enlightened judgment on improvements in the art, and has himself invented a number of valuable improvements in the printing press. He cannot regret his long days of apprenticeship, and it is not too much to say that it is they which have won for him his truly honorable and useful position, one which the constant sense of usefulness and competence must make doubly dear to him.

A Horse's Sense of Smell.

The horses will leave musty hay untouched in his bin, however hungry, says the Prarie Farmer. He will not drink of water objectionable to his questioning sniffs, or from a bucket which some odor makes offensive, however thirsty. His intelligent nostril will widen, quiver, and query over the daintiest bit, offered by the fairest of hands, with coaxings that would make a mortal shut his eyes and swallow a nauseous mouthful at a gulp.

A mare is never satisfied by either sight or whinney that her colt is really her own until she has a certified nasal certificate to the fact.

A blind horse, now living, will not allow the approach of any stranger without showing signs of anger not safely to be disregarded. The distinction is evidently made by his sense of smell, and at a considerable distance. Blind horses, as a rule, will gallop wildly about a pasture without striking the surrounding fence. The sense of smell informs them of its proximity. Others will, when loosened from the stable, go directly to the gate or bars opening to their accustomed feeding grounds, and when desiring to return, after hours of careless wandering, will distinguish the one outlet and patiently await its opening. The odor of that particular part of the fence is their pilot to it.

The horses in browsing, or while gathering herbage with his lips, is guided in its choice of proper food entirely by its nostrils. Blind horses do not make mistakes in their diet. In the temple at Olympus a bronze horse was exhibited, at the sight of which six real horses experienced the most violent emotions. Ælian judiciously observed that the most perfect art could not imitate nature sufficiently well to produce so strong illusion. Like Pliny and Pavsanius, he consequently affirms that "in casting the statue a magician had throw Hippomanes upon it," which by the odor of the plant deceived the horses, and therein we have the secret of the miracle. The scent alone of a buffalo robe will cause many horses to evince lively terror, and the floating scent of a railroad train will frighten some long after the locomotive is out of sight and hearing.

Would Change His Business.

Mr. Reitzvitzky concluded to start in the manufacture of pants "for the trade only." He called at one of the large cloth houses, interviewed the credit man, and the following conversation took place:

C. M.—How much money have you clear of all indebtedness?

Mr. R.—Whole tree toesand dollars.

C. M.—Well, I give you a line of $1,000 credit for the present, until we see how you pay.

Mr. R.—Ole right. Vat are your terms?

C. M.—Oh, 5.30, 4.60, 3.60, or four months net.

Mr. R.—Vell, I vill buy on four months net.

C. M.—Umph! In that case we sell only on approved notes.

Mr. R.—Vell, I vill gif you mine note.

C. M.—That is all right, but does your note sell in the market?

Mr. B.—Mine frent! uff mine notes vood sell in de market, I vood make note, not cloding.—Hebrew Standard.

YOUNG father—Blamed if I know what's the matter with the baby, doctor, but she cries all the time.

Doctor—Perhaps she has been cutting her teeth.

Young father—I don't believe it, doctor, she ain't had a knife or anything sharp to play with since she was born.
